Pure, powerful longing

[Jacob El-Baz photo]

Editorial

Rosh Hashanah, the new calendar year, marks the beginning of a special opportunity for us, a 10-day period – aseret y'mai tshuvah – for repentance, rethinking, reflecting, returning, as it were, to a deeper, calmer, inner place, where, in a turbulent world, we can be more at peace with our conscience and ourselves.

It is both very telling and very significant that those 10 days end with the stirring, hopeful declaration by all worshippers in all synagogues around the world: L'shanah haba b'Yerushalayim – Next year in Jerusalem!

However intended – literally, metaphorically, allegorically or even lyrically – the reference resonates with possibility and pure, powerful longing.

Even when we conclude what is essentially a period of prolonged, personal soul-searching, we do so with a reverential and proud communal nod in the direction of Jerusalem, with a public acknowledgment that our individuality is tied up with our peoplehood and our peoplehood with eternal Jerusalem.

That is the Jewish way. It has always been and thus it will always be.

Eternal Jerusalem – as place and as idea – is at the very core of who we are and what we are. It ties us one to the other, one another to our past and one another to Israel.

For the last two wearying years, however, the enemies of Israel have been trying to undermine that core. Eternal Jerusalem – place and idea – has been under attack.

Their campaign started precisely two years ago on Rosh Hashanah. It now grinds on into its third year.

The campaign would be unimaginable in this day and age, except for the fact that it is actually happening and that we are living through it, though in Israel, more than 600 unfortunate souls have died because of it.

Not merely a territorial conflict between Palestinians and Israelis fought in the Middle East, the campaign against Israel has been carried, like an insidious bacillus, into Europe and other continents, spreading diseased, medieval anti-Jewish attitudes into the corridors of academia, the corporate world, organized labour and the Fifth Estate.

Elsewhere in this issue, Haifa University law professor Amnon Reichman tells CJN reporter Anna Morgan that at some academic conferences he has recently attended, "the entire Israeli population is being branded as enemies of all humanity."

Thank you for lifting our spirits

Moshe Katsav President of the State of Israel

Dear friends,

The uniformly used Jewish calendar is one of the important and central factors uniting the life of the Jewish people in Israel and throughout the Jewish world, including all its tribes and streams.

The past year has been a difficult one for the Jewish people. The continued brutal and merciless terror attacks throughout Israel, on the one hand, and the anti-Semitic occurrences, especially in Europe, on the other, bring back painful memories of the past.

The State of Israel is obligated to protect its citizens. Regrettably, the right of self-defence is sometimes criticized in world capitals. No country in the world can ignore such vicious attacks on its citizens. We are, unfortunately, facing waves of violence after prolonged negotiations in which we made far-reaching compromises in order to attain peace but the Palestinians did not honour their obligations. We are not a nation desiring war and vengeance. We wish to live in peace and security.

The solidarity rallies with Israel by Jewish communities throughout the world and, especially, visits to our country, lift our spirits. We thank these Jewish communities for their expressions of support.

I wish to take this opportunity to wish you, your families, the Jewish people and all humanity, a happy and blessed New Year, a year of peace and security, a year of tranquillity and calm. My hopes for us all are expressed in the traditional New Year wish: "May we leave the past year with its hardships behind us and may a New Year full of blessings begin."

A Happy and Joyous New Year

Drawing comfort from our faith

Keith Landy
National president, CJC

One year ago, as we began our observance of Rosh Hashanah, the flames at "ground zero" continued to smoulder, and the dust of the fallen World Trade Center had literally not yet settled. While the Jewish people were still reeling from the just-completed shameful travesty of the so-called UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, the scourge, scope and capacity of international terror revealed itself to what became a traumatized world.

It is often said that the world changed on Sept. 11. A more apt description would be that it was not the world that changed but people's understanding of it as its dark side was exposed. For the Jewish people, however, the existence of a resilient and sustained international terrorist infrastructure buttressed by an ideology of hate was not news. Although we had been facing terrorism for decades, for us, the current war on terror began one year prior.

It was two years ago on erev Rosh Hashanah that Arafat unleashed his murderous war against Israel. Palestinian suicide bombings and shootings have murdered hundreds of innocent Israelis and injured many more. In short order, the effects of that campaign rippled throughout the entire

As we approach this Rosh Hashanah, we can't help but believe there's a brighter year ahead.

Our beloved Israel is trying to recover from two years of terror, while remaining constantly on guard against future attacks. Every Israeli family has been affected by the unrelenting wave of violence that has afflicted the country and thousands of Israelis are going through painful psychological or physical rehabilitation. The Israeli economy is suffering severely, with the tourism industry devastated by developments beyond its control. Since last year's Durban conference and its forum for hatred, ugly acts of anti-Semitism around the world have stung hundreds of Jewish communities. And here at home, we lost a cherished member of our own community, David Rosenzweig, to a senseless murder.

Yes, there's good reason for pessimism and anxiety. But there are better reasons for optimism and hope.

In the face of national trauma and tragedy, the people of Israel have never been so united, so willing to understand their differences, so determined to survive and prosper against an onslaught of destruction. For all of us, the value of life itself has never been more appreciated.

Confronted by Israel's emergency, our remarkable Jewish Shloshim held for victims at Hebrew University

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The July 31 bombing at Hebrew University that killed nine people and injured 85 others represents a new level of terror because Jews and Arabs have studied there together in harmony, Israeli consul Zehavit Ben Hillel said at a shloshim service for the victims last week.

For Ben Hillel, the incident had a personal dimension, she said. In addition to being a Hebrew U graduate, before her arrival in Toronto she held the same diplomatic position in Lima, Peru, to which one of the victims, David (Diego) Ladowski, 29, had recently been appointed.

The service, held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, was organized by the Alumni of the Rothberg International School and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU).

Participants included more than half a dozen alumni of the university and its Rothberg International School, where half a dozen Canadians are currently studying.

A responsibility to preserve their memory

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David, is also a Rothberg alumnus, as is Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Congregation, who officiated along with Beth David's Cantor Marshall Loomer.

"All of us here share a link with, and a love for, the State of Israel that magnifies the grief felt for the almost 700 innocents murdered in Israel these past two years," said Rabbi Scheim.

Eli Savage, a 1997 alumnus who was a friend of one of those killed – San Diego native Marla Bennett, 24 – said all the victims "led lives of tremendous courage and spirit, and we have a responsibility to preserve their memory and carry on what they began."

Bennett, who was working on a master's degree in Jewish education, organized food packages for Palestinian families during the Jenin crisis, said Ali Feldman, who studied with Bennett and fellow bombing victim Benjamin Blutstein, 25, last year at the Pardes Institute for Jewish Studies.

Mubarak's unwelcome advice

From the editor's desk

Last week, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak deigned to offer advice to U.S. President George W. Bush. Some might prefer to say he hectored the president. Speaking to an audience of university students in Alexandria, Mubarak warned Bush not to strike at Saddam Hussein.

"Not a single Arab leader supports an attack against Iraq," the Egyptian president said. "An attack would plunge the region into disorder and chaos."

Both assertions are highly debatable, and indeed, are being debated each day in the pages of newspapers around the world. It is also worthwhile to point out that if history is any guide to the future, the assertions are also patently false.

But the pungent irony of Mubarak's remarks was the admonition to Bush "if you strike at the Iraqi people... and leave the Palestinian issue unresolved, not a single Arab ruler would be able to curb a rising tide of popular sentiment." He then piously urged the Israelis and Palestinians to "sit at the negotiating table."

Mubarak's advice was less than gratuitous; it was self-serving piffle.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat abandoned "the negotiating table" at Camp David more than two years ago. He chose violence over diplomacy. In fact, violence is really the only diplomacy he has ever known.

In the recent words of New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman, "the [Palestinian] uprising was a reckless, pointless, foolish adventure... because at the time, the Palestinians had before them on the table, from the U.S. and Israel, a credible diplomatic alternative to war – a peace offer that would have satisfied the vast majority of their aspirations for statehood."

Mubarak implied that an Israeli-Palestinian accord was a prerequisite to an American-led attack against Iraq. Setting aside the legitimate discussion surrounding the wisdom of attacking Saddam, it is patently absurd to confer, on the Palestinians, a veto in relation to such an attack, which is the effective import of Mubarak's finger-wagging advice.

The Egyptian leader also offered some counsel to Israel. "Israel's resort to military force to quell the Palestinians is completely futile and the killing and the destruction might continue for another 50 years."

Alas, Mubarak's prediction regarding the continuation of the "killing" may prove true. But whether it does lies totally within the control of the Palestinian leadership. Their past record and present legacy leave little room to hope the killing will end any time soon. The collapse of Oslo was in fact the collapse of that hope.

Thirty years ago, on Sept. 6. at the hastily-arranged memorial ceremony in Munich for the 11 slain Israeli Olympians, Willi Daume, president of the Olympic Organizing Committee spoke the following: "Today is a day of immense mourning. Even in the world of crime, there are still some taboos, a final limit of dehumanization beyond which one dares not go. This limit was crossed by those guilty of the attack in the Olympic Village. They brought murder into this great and fine celebration of the peoples of the world, this celebration that had been dedicated to peace."

Hosni Mubarak
[Drawing by Micheal Nissimov]

Herr Daume was correct to be incensed. But he was, unfortunately, wrong in pegging that limit at the slaughter of Olympic athletes. There were still some "taboos," even he could not foresee, new limits of "dehumanization" beyond which a new generation of murderers and thugs would "dare to go."

Could he, could anyone, have imagined the stalking of youngsters, discotheque dancers, children at bus stops, children outside their schools, by suicide bombers? Could he, could anyone, have imagined the recruitment of teenagers for the casual but deliberate killing of others by blowing themselves up?

At the same memorial service, after Daume spoke, Bundespräsident Gustav Heinemann reiterated a question which Israel has asked since its very first days of existence, and which, lately, the president of the United States has been asking as well.

"Who bears the responsibility for this crime? First of all a terrorist organization that thinks hatred and murder can be methods of political struggle. But in addition, there are the countries which do not stop these men from perpetrating such acts."

Adhering to Mubarak's unhelpful advice is to encourage mankind's crossing into a terrifying realm of unimaginably horrible new taboos. And as we have seen in the past two years, for those people for whom there are no taboos, there are also no "limits of dehumanization."

Mubarak has not visited Israel since Ariel Sharon became prime minister. He has never condemned the vile anti-Semitic propaganda so common in Egyptian media. Nor has he ever publicly denounced the oft-stated ambitions of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah of ending the "occupation," by which they mean, of course, ending Israel.

Mubarak's advice, therefore, is best kept to himself.

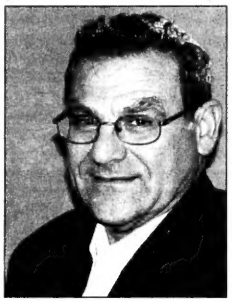
Israeli political analyst doubts peace possible

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tense co-existence with the Palestinians is all Israel can realistically expect in the foreseeable future, says a prominent Israeli political analyst.

Ruling out the prospect of a formal peace agreement, Efraim Inbar suggested that long-range interim accords may be possible but that a two-state solution should be regarded as a "a naive slogan."

Inbar, director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, voiced skepticism about Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer's plan to defuse the Palestinian uprising by means of a mutually agreed truce.



Efraim Inbar

On Aug. 18, Israel announced it would undertake a trial withdrawal from parts of the Gaza Strip and Bethlehem in exchange for assurances that the Palestinians would rein in terrorism there.

The accord was portrayed by both sides as a pilot project for further Israeli withdrawals and the eventual achievement of a full ceasefire. Israel withdrew from areas in Gaza and the centre of Bethlehem, but postponed a pullout from Hebron until after the High Holy Days.

In an interview, Inbar, a conservative commentator who opposes the land-for-peace diplomatic formula and has written books on Israel's foreign and defence policy, cast doubt on Ben-Eliezer's plan. "I'm very skeptical because, basically, the Palestinians haven't made up their minds to crack down on their extremists."

Referring to the Palestinian Authority (PA), he said, "They are using the extremists to bleed Israel."

Besides, he added, PA President Yasser Arafat fears that a civil war may break out if he disarms and arrests Palestinian terrorists.

Inbar suspects that the PA is exploiting the current negotiations to strengthen Arafat's position. Israel and the United States have rejected Arafat's leadership, claiming he is not a serious negotiating partner.

Inbar, here to speak to Holy Blossom Temple under the auspices of Arza Canada (Reform Zionist Organization in Canada), charged that the current talks to achieve a ceasefire are eroding the United States' promise to sideline Arafat.

"And we're playing the same game so that no one can accuse Israel of missing an opportunity to reach a ceasefire."

Arafat, he noted, is irrelevant because he lacks the power or the will to bring Palestinian society into a state of co-existence with Israel. "He's incorrigible."

The intifadah, he observed, was an important awakening for Israelis. "Peace is a nice dream, but it remains a dream. It has educated Israelis as to the limits of the peace process and moved them toward a more hawkish stance."

Inbar suggested that Israel cannot make peace with the Palestinians at present because the incumbent Israeli government wants to maintain control over much of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, while the PA seeks a complete Israeli withdrawal from these areas.

Given these realities, Israel can hope for no more than "tense co-existence, based on a balance of power, with the Palestinians."

What is possible, at best, would be long-range interim accords granting the Palestinians autonomy and allowing Israel to maintain a "security umbrella" in the territories.

Dismissing a two-state solution as a "naive slogan," Inbar said, "What is needed is a conflict management strategy rather than conflict resolution. We have to learn to live with problems."

The Zionist movement, he explained, has lived with strife for more than a century and done very well. "We're a strong country, militarily and economically, and we can probably go on with this conflict, especially in light of the fact that we tried our best to reach an accommodation with the Palestinians."

Inbar likened the two-state peace plan presented by Ehud Barak, the former Israeli prime minister, to the 1947 UN partition plan. As he put it: "It won't be revived, and most Israelis reject it."

There may be Palestinians who accept a two-state solution, he allowed, but "they're not in power and they don't have guns."

In his estimation, Arafat's objective is Israel's gradual dissolution. "He hasn't given up his dream. Otherwise, he would have agreed to Barak's offer" at Camp David and Taba.

Inbar believes that the intifadah, which he described as "a war of attrition," will peter out in about a year.

The Palestinians are showing signs of fatigue. They are under international pressure to stop the violence. They have not been able to force Israel to withdraw unilaterally from the territories, their overriding goal. They realize that terrorism is unacceptable after the events of Sept. 11, 2001 in the United States.

In short, he concluded, the uprising has been "a strategic blunder."

Asked if Israel can end the intifadah militarily, Inbar replied, "Military means are part of the solution. So far, Israel has conducted a limited war. We aren't exercising our fullest capa-

Don't use religion to justify killing, says Toronto rabbi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich has already begun to formulate his address in anticipation of a community memorial day in honour of the men and women killed during last year's 9/11 terrorist attacks.

Rabbi Flanzraich, of the Beth Sholom Synagogue, will serve as the Jewish community representative at the Sept. 4 memorial and will call on people of all faiths to oppose the abuse of religion to justify killing.

"Religion may be part of the problem, but religion, no question, is part of the solution," he said.

Rabbi Flanzraich will join representatives of several faith groups at the memorial event, which is being organized by Toronto Police Service, 13 Division, in partnership with the Eglinton Community Initiative. It will take place at 10:45 a.m. at the Toronto Fire Department, 555 Oakwood Ave. at Bude Street.

At 9:30 a.m., a Toronto Police honour guard, an RCMP marching unit, a Canadian Armed Forces contingent as well as representatives of Royal Canadian Legions, Toronto Fire Services, Department of Ambulance and the Boy Scouts of Canada will lead a parade from 13 Division to the event site.

A year ago the world watched in horror as planes crashed into the World Trade Centres (left). At right: the aftermath.

The event will also serve as a fund-raiser for the families of the four Canadian soldiers who were killed while serving in Afghanistan.

Rabbi Flanzraich said he was asked to participate by the police organizers of the memorial. Thirteen Division is next door to the Beth Sholom Synagogue, and the shul has a history dating back to the 1950s of participating in interfaith events, he noted.

Though faith leaders have been assigned only a few minutes each to speak, Rabbi Flanzraich said he plans to point out that "fundamentalism as a wholesale item in religion is a dangerous thing. Every religion can look at itself and see the potential of fundamentalism relying on violence," he said.

Other representatives of faith groups at the memorial include: Dudhendra Doobay (Hindu), Rondo Thomas (Christian), Father Ismael Silva (Roman Catholic), Haroon Salamat (Islamic), Ven. Lama Tenzin Kalasana (Buddhist) and Rev. Paul Lainen (Lutheran).

Destined to Survive
Uplifting stories from the worst of times
Israel Cohen was a prisoner in a slave-labor hell during the Holocaust. More than once he thought that he was a footstep away from the end, but he was destined to survive — to start a new life, raise a proud family, and share his experiences with us. And his experiences are truly a gift, because Cohen is a man with a heart and an unshakable faith. His articles, some of which are included in this book, have appeared in religious and secular publications in the United States and Canada.
We pick up any book about the Holocaust with hesitancy and trepidation, but we put down Destined to Survive with gratitude that such a man was willing to share his experiences with us.
Herman Wouk, an admirer of the author, has contributed the Foreword.

Intifadah has strengthened Israel's resolve: Gillerman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israelis have stood up to the Palestinian uprising with courage and valour, Israel's ambassador-designate to the United Nations says.

"The Palestinians thought they'd drive us away," said Dan Gillerman, who takes up his post in January. "They thought we were soft and spoiled."

If anything, he added in an interview prior to addressing a UJA Federation major donors' event last week, the intifadah has strengthened Israel's resolve.

Cafes, bars and restaurants in Israeli cities and towns are full, the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra attracts capacity audiences, and life goes on.

"At the end of the day, not far off, we will win this war. We're already winning it."

Gillerman, a well-connected 58-year-old businessman and chair of the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, acknowledged that the intifadah has dealt Israel's economy a severe blow.

"Israel has lost five to six percent of its gross domestic product – $5 to $6 billion (US). Tourism and construction are suffering badly."

At the same time, he noted, the Israeli economy has shown great resiliency. "Any other country that had suffered so much would have gone the way of Argentina," he observed, referring to that bankrupt South American nation. "But Israel is surviving and persevering."

Foreign investment is down by about 60 percent. But Israel's economy remains vibrant, and foreign investors who keep the faith will reap profits, he predicted.

Gillerman, a protégé of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, lambasted Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority.

"Our tragedy, and that of the region, is Arafat. To make peace, you need a De Klerck and a Mandela."

F.W. De Klerck was president of South Africa when he released black leader Nelson Mandela and agreed to dismantle apartheid, thereby setting the stage for South Africa's peaceful transformation into a multiracial democracy.

"Israel has produced three De Klercks – [Yitzhak] Rabin, Peres and [Ehud] Barak. But unfortunately, Arafat is no Mandela, and is incapable of making the transition from terrorist to statesman."

The tide, however, appears to be turning.

"The Palestinians are fed up with corruption in the Palestinian Authority, and they feel Arafat made a great mistake in rejecting Barak's and Clinton's peace plans."

At the Camp David summit in July 2000, Barak offered the Palestinians about 90 percent of the West Bank, all of the Gaza Strip and parts of eastern Jerusalem in exchange for peace.

Subsequently, U.S. president Bill Clinton sweetened Barak's offer.

"Arafat is the problem rather than the solution," said Gillerman. "Eventually, we'll have a partner with whom we can reach a settlement."

Asked if Barak's and Clinton's plans are still on the table, he said, "I'm not so sure the Barak/Clinton initiatives are still viable options."

Gillerman declined to say whether he supported a two-state solution. "I'm still a private citizen and can't get into these matters. What shape a settlement will take in the future, I can't tell you at the moment. But the intifadah has broken down mutual trust and created new suspicions."

Gillerman said he wants to believe there is a pragmatic Palestinian leadership interested in peace and coexistence.

It is in Israel's self-interest to help the Palestinians improve their economy, which has been shattered by the intifadah.

"At the end of the day, a higher Palestinian standard of living means a lower level of terrorism."

Gillerman claimed that Israel is fighting terrorism not only on its behalf, but for the civilized world.

"If we don't win this war, it'll end up on the streets of Toronto, Paris and London. The free world should support us, politically and economically."

Gillerman was originally chosen by Peres as Israel's ambassador to the United States. When Prime Minister Ariel Sharon objected, he and Peres worked out a compromise. Danny Ayalon, Sharon's senior advisor, was appointed envoy to Washington, while Gillerman was designated to succeed Yehuda Lancry at the United Nations.

"I've made it a rule not to issue public statements about the United Nations until I take up my position," explained Gillerman. "It wouldn't be right to discuss the UN until then."

Nonetheless, Gillerman made several observations.

"I know the UN is not perceived as the most pro-Israel club in the world, but it's not a lost cause. A lot can be done to present Israel's case."

He has no illusions that Arab and Muslim views of Israel will change. But he believes that dialogue is important and can achieve results not necessarily reflected in UN votes.

Syria's membership on the Security Council makes no sense, given its support of terrorism. "It's a manifestation of the craziness and hypocrisy of the world we live in."

Gillerman, a Sabra and graduate of the Hebrew University, comes to his new job with no experience as a diplomat. But, as he likes to point out, he is not exactly inexperienced in diplomacy.

After being appointed to head up the Tel Aviv Chamber of Commerce and the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, he established an office in Moscow.

Its objective was to forge Israeli economic relations with countries that had no formal political ties with Israel: the Soviet Union, its satellite states in Eastern Europe, China, Vietnam, Indonesia, Pakistan, Malaysia, Bangladesh and other Asian nations.

As well, Gillerman played a role in developing commercial links with Arab states.

"Maybe this prepared me for my job at the UN."

Family chooses bar mitzvah, volunteerism in Israel

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Toronto dentist Ian Grayson and his wife Regena (Gigi) started to plan the bar mitzvah for their firstborn, Eric, when he was just one year old.

The idea germinated during a 1990 visit to Israel when Ian had offered his professional services to Jerusalem's Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI). Gigi bought a tallit and put it away for safekeeping until their son could observe his 13th birthday at the Western Wall.

DVI is a free clinic established by the late Trudi Berger, a Holocaust survivor, to treat underprivileged children who cannot otherwise receive dental care in Jerusalem. Needy youngsters under 18 are accepted regardless of race, colour or religion. DVI's mandate is to recruit dentists from all over the world to contribute their time and professional expertise.

Fast forward to 2002. The Graysons, now including Brittany, 11, and Michelle, 8, prepared for the long-anticipated bar mitzvah, and Ian committed to another session at DVI. They planned to spend three weeks in Israel but relatives and friends, deeply disturbed by media reports, urged them to cancel.

Ian and Gigi were adamant. They were going to celebrate the bar mitzvah in Jerusalem, accompanied by Ian's mother Ann, Eric's only living grandparent.

Their resolve was tested after news of the Passover bombing in a Netanya hotel. They discussed observing the bar mitzvah in Toronto, but that didn't feel right.

"Ian and I looked at each other," Gigi notes "and said, 'We'll go. We won't let those guys spoil our bar mitzvah!'"

And they did. In the first week they were based at the home of Benny and Vera Amedi, Jerusalemites whom they had first met when the Amedis visited Toronto.

Afterward, they rented a car and toured Tiberias, the Golan Heights, Eilat, Netanya, Masada and the Dead Sea.

Were they worried, tense?

"No. We realized very soon that security was extensive," Ian declares. "You couldn't go into a food store without being checked. Coming off the highway into a city, there were barriers to pass."

Back in Jerusalem they moved into a comfortable apartment, one of four provided gratis by the municipal government for each of the volunteer dentists and their families.

Before coming to Israel they had contacted Rabbi Howard Markose, an American living in Israel who had also spent 10 years in Toronto. He assisted with the bar mitzvah service, which took place at Robinson's Arch adjoining the Kotel. It was exactly what the Graysons wanted. Just a few guests – the Amedis, a Toronto neighbour who was in town and the immediate family – intimate and meaningful. They celebrated afterward at luncheon in a restaurant.

While not denying Israel's real security concerns, Ian stressed that the media tend to paint a very negative view that is, he says, "out of whack." They encourage people to visit Israel, to offer moral and economic support. They also emphasize how desperately DVI volunteers are needed at the clinic. The majority (many not Jewish) seem to come from the Scandinavian countries and Holland. "They really care."

Would Ian and Gigi go back to Israel? "Absolutely."

What about the children?

"Before we went," says Eric, "me and my sisters were talking about how we felt. I said I was a little bit scared but I was 95 per cent sure I wanted to go. My sisters were more scared but when we got there, we had such a good time. It was the best vacation ever. We all want to go back."

Each one has special memories. At the wall, Eric remembers "being right in the roots of Judaism.

"And there's so much to do."

Brittany loved the beaches, particularly Netanya and the Mediterranean "because it was so beautiful with the horizon so wide." She liked talking to the soldiers, who could all speak English.

Michelle, just 8, clearly recalls a jeep trip in the desert and a stopover in a Bedouin tent for "sage tea with pita baked over a fire and filled with warm goat cheese. It was good."

Ian asserts, "I have such respect for how the Israelis live. They don't stay behind bolted doors. They go out and do everyday things."

"People tell me I'm brave," Gigi adds. "I'm not brave. They are. They live it."

"It's not a rare occurrence these days," Reichman adds, "that you'll be at a European conference and academics will argue that Jews are not a legal entity and therefore don't have a right to a state."

"What other country," he plaintively asks, "has to defend its right to exist over and over again?"

In a soaring essay entitled "From New York to Jerusalem," delivered last year at the Ingeborg Rennert Center for Jerusalem Studies at Bar Ilan University, distinguished author Cynthia Ozick commented on that very same point.

"The central shame of the 20th century was that the right of Jews to exist was put in question and murderously answered. The shame did not stop there; it swells grotesquely, putting in question the right of Jews to exercise sovereignty in their own land and in their own ancient capital. The ubiquitous phrase 'Israel's right to exist' is heard even in the mouths of apparent friends, and it is a corrupting and degrading phrase."

Even as these words are being written, a symposium organized by the Zayed Center for Coordination and Follow-up, whose chairman is the deputy prime minister of the United Arab Emirates, is convening in Abu Dhabi to discuss the "false fable" of the Holocaust.

According to its press release, "The symposium aims at disclosing many historical, political fallacies promoted by Israel and Zionism through different means especially the spread of fibs and exaggerations regarding the so-called Holocaust." The centre also asserts that "Jewish activities... agitated European hatred against Jews."

The secretary general of the Arab League, former Egyptian foreign minister Amr Moussa, sent a personal representative to address the symposium.

How could this be happening fewer than six decades after the gates of the Nazi death camps were thrown open? And, yet, it is.

Even more unbelievably, most of the rest of the world merely shrugs, preferring to shout at Israel for defending itself with all force, rather than at Arab leaders for assiduously nurturing a culture of hatred against Jews, for inciting terrorism against Jews and the Jewish State and for unleashing waves of gruesome, bloody violence against Israelis.

But the Jewish State will not submit to its own demise nor will the Jewish people any longer be "degraded" by the unwitting or deliberate complicity of apparent friends.

We know it is only through our own actions that we will merit being inscribed and sealed in next year's Book of Life. For we are all part of each other. And as the heavenly portals slowly lock at the close of the aseret y'mai tshuvah, the ringing ancient declaration will be our very first communal and individual action of the new year, proclaiming to the world that the Jewish return to history will not be undone by the evil that speaks of "false fables," elevates hatred to religious doctrine, glorifies suicide as sacral duty and targets for murder helpless, innocent men, women, children and infants.

Shanah tovah. L'shanah haba b'Yerushalayim.

Money, not will, missing on campus

David Goldberg and Tilly Shames of the Canada-Israel Committee lamented "the absence of a co-ordinated effort by scholars to articulate a concerted pro-Israeli viewpoint" (Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challege Mideast distortion," CJN, Aug. 22).

Ironically, until a few years ago, there was an organization that did precisely that. Composed of hundreds of academics across the country – about 25 per cent of them non-Jews – the non-partisan Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East was the Israel advocacy voice on campus. It organized conferences, lobbied government and university officials, mobilized students, wrote briefs and research papers, sponsored trips to Israel, arranged speaking tours for visiting Israeli professors and politicians and published a scholarly journal.

But in a short-sighted decision, UJA Federation leaders at the time concluded they could no longer afford to fund the organization. It was, as the Goldberg-Shames article implies, a mistake.

The will to engage in this type of pro-Israel activity has not dried up across university campuses. Only the funding has.

There is a storehouse of talent among Canadian academics, as well as graduate and undergraduate students, all of which can be quickly harnessed to counter the anti-Israel activism that exists on campuses today.

There is only one ingredient missing to give this talent the structure and the focus it needs: money. In the greater scheme of community fund-raising, the amount required is not large. The investment would certainly pay dividends, not only in improved public relations for Israel, but in an improved atmosphere for Jewish students and professors in Canada.

Ignore Peace Now

The article about Peace Now activities ("Peace Now asks Graham to press for Mideast conference," CJN, Aug. 22) is not warranted. Peace Now is a dangerously naive group of dreamers. Their interference in Canadian politics – by asking Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham to use Canada's influence to take a stand against further settlement expansion – is unwise at best and treasonous at worst. Peace Now's dovish policies merely encourage more terrorism. Their Canadian activities deserve to be ignored.

Virtual tourism a boost?

I cannot understand why so many of my fellow Jewish Canadians have so many reasons for failing to stand shoulder to shoulder with our Israeli cousins during this time of crisis ("Israel gets economic boost from virtual tourism," CJN, Aug. 15).

While I was in Israel in the midst of the Yom Kippur War in 1973, working on kibbutzim in a war zone only a few kilometres from the Golan Heights, the situation was far more dangerous than it is today. The kibbutzniks, however, were brave and calm and accepted whatever conditions life brought them. They imparted a feeling of work-as-usual to the volunteers. Young Canadians and Americans were everywhere in Israel, touring, working and studying.

These days, though, people don't go to Israel at all. Instead, they send a few dollars for "virtual tourism."

How sad and inadequate, especially from the many who consider Israel their homeland.

Cabinet ministers failed us

As a pioneer of Holocaust education in Canada, the author or co-author of five books on the Holocaust and a member in the 1970s of the Holocaust committees of the Canadian Jewish Congress, I would like to say that we informed the Canadian government about dozens of Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

Although there were three Jewish cabinet ministers (Herb Gray, Barney Danson and Robert Kaplan) at that time, nothing was ever done. In an article in your newspaper, Simon Wiesenthal was quoted as saying that he gave up on the Canadian authorities and would not bother to send them the names and addresses (and in some cases, the telephone numbers) of Nazis or Nazi collaborators living in Canada, since the Canadian government had refused to act. One of the war criminals buried a living Jewish infant in a shallow grave while forcing the hapless parents to watch. Then he killed the parents, slowly, because they were Jews. And the Canadian government refused to act on this information.

I didn't like former prime minister Brian Mulroney, but we must give him the credit he richly deserves for establishing the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals (Deschenes Commission), which the Liberals, with their three highly placed Jewish ministers, had steadfastly refused to do. The Deschenes Commission led to a number of successful prosecutions. Above all, it created sleepless nights for the war criminals and collaborators.

Why did the Liberal government refuse to act or to even consider acting? Did the orders come right from the top, the adored and adulated former prime minister Pierre Trudeau? What he did during the war years is not mentioned in his biography. Just before the war, he received cadet training at Brebeuf College. Such people, with military know-how, were immediately commissioned at the start of World War II. But Trudeau wasn't. I think one of the reasons he refused to act on the war-criminal issue was that the whole topic of World War II made him uncomfortable. That is also why he let our armed forces deteriorate.

So let us stop hailing the retired Jewish cabinet ministers as great Jews. They failed our people. They failed the scattered bones of our brothers in Europe. And they failed by any standard of conscience and morality.

Remembering Munich

September 5, 1972

In 1973, Editions Denöel, Paris, published Medaille de Sang, written by award-winning French reporter Serge Groussard. The book was a comprehensive account of the Munich massacre, that took place 30 years ago, today, in 1972, when 11 Israelis, hostages of Black September Palestinian terrorists, were killed as they sat in helicopters tied in their seats.

Groussard's book appeared in English in 1975, translated by Harold Salemson and published by William Morrow and Company, as The Blood of Israel.

It is utterly heartwrenching.

The following is excerpted from The Blood of Israel.

Wednesday, September 6

"In the fine stadium where the eleven victims had been part of the opening parade eleven days ago, the Olympic Movement foregathered for the memorial ceremony in honor of the Israelis. The doors were open to one and all. A silent, troubled crowd filled the stands. The delegations taking part in the Games had their places facing the official reviewing stand, on the field, where 3,000 seats had been set up. At ten o'clock, the Munich Philharmonic, dressed in black, began the funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica. The slow lamento of the strings, in its breathtaking beauty, filled the temple of bodily triumph as in a nightmare…

"A shiver ran through the crowd. No announcement, but all at once 80,000 heads turned toward the Marathon Gate.

"The Israeli team, or what was left of it, seventeen out of twenty-eight, appeared…

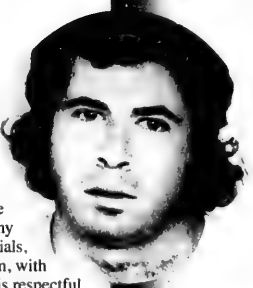
"The Jewish athletes displayed such grief, and such dignity, that in silent spontaneous homage the whole stadium rose to its feet…

"A large part of the IOC was on the stand of honor, with its outgoing President Avery Brundage and his successor Lord Killanin. The highest authorities in West Germany had come, headed by President Dr. Gustav Heinemann… Immortal athletes, such as Jesse Owens and Emil Zapotek, were weeping, without false shame. And then there were those who were absent – deliberately…

"Not one athlete, not one official from any Arab country was present in the stadium. Nor was there anyone from the USSR or East Germany. Apparently, the Yugoslavs and Poles had not come, either. The Olympic flag, in its nacreous whiteness with the five overlapping wheels, waved softly at half-mast, and like it the flags of the 122 nations participating in the Munich Games were also lowered. Before the ceremony ended, there would be wild protests from Arab officials, because of that. Their governments supported them, with cables which in some cases were terrifying. For this respectful ceremony, without any prayer service, was being seen on world television, so that hundreds of millions of people could see the colours of Egypt, Syria, Algeria, and the others, lowered to the mourning position…

"In Jerusalem, an official communiqué was released… Prime Minister Golda Meir had cabled Chancellor Willy Brandt her personal appreciation of his government's decision to 'take action for the liberation of the Israeli hostages and to employ force to that end.'

"The Israeli government ordered a national funeral for the murdered athletes, and a seven-day period of official mourning."



Thursday, September 7

"In ten cemeteries in Israel, and also beyond the oceans, in Ohio on Lake Erie, an honor guard folded back the flags covering the coffins and handed them to the next of kin. The bodies were lowered into the graves. Each person threw three handfuls of earth on to the top of the coffin and the Kaddish, the prayer of obedience and peace… was heard.

"Everywhere the funerals were over before the end of the afternoon, under the same brilliant sky. Then the people of the Book went home and closed their doors.

"The next day, Friday, was Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, the year 5732, according to the Hebrew calendar.

"It was a day darkened by national mourning. But, in picture and in word, all of Israel, in these hours, bent over the children of those who were the Olympic dead, with wildly determined affection.

"This was triumph over death, the perennation of the Jewish people – of the blood of Israel."

Terror has many sides

As many readers already know, the Internet is an unending source of surprising information.

Just recently, I read the following:

"Since 1880, 20,000 Jews have been killed in the land of Israel through wars and acts of terrorism. This amounts to an average figure of 160 per year."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

That is a large number when taken in the abstract, but when seen in the context of history, a different perspective emerges.

The item about Israel went on to say that about 600 Israelis a year are killed in traffic accidents and 10,000 Israeli deaths each year are attributable to smoking. (I do not know what the comparable figures are for Canada, but I am quite sure that they are astonishingly high as well.)

Nevertheless, the above terror statistics are disturbing, and, unfortunately, they are not surprising to those of us who follow the news.

Israel has been in a constant state of siege, and its enemies have had one purpose: not peace or any kind of settlement, but the destruction of Israel altogether. I have written and spoken about this theme before, and I will repeat it again: Israel's enemies are not interested in a peaceful arrangement because that would mean acknowledging the legitimacy of Israel. But the country's enemies have no such intention.

That means that peace between Israel and the Arabs is not possible.

If this sounds overly pessimistic, I admit that it is, for pessimism, unfortunately, is currently, as it has been for so many years, the only accurate way of assessing the situation in the Middle East.

As long as Israel's enemies desire its destruction, peace is not conceivable. Only when the great majority of Arab states and Arabs in general acknowledge the legitimacy of a Jewish State will the situation change. Failing such an acknowledgement and a willingness to deal with the reality of Israel's existence, nothing will change and war will, alas, be a constant part of life for residents of the Jewish State.

For those of us who live in the Diaspora, there is one important lesson to be drawn from this: we have to be aware of the sad reality that, for the foreseeable future, Israel will have to defend its very existence, and it is our responsibility as Jews to support its efforts with the utmost liberality.

Doing anything less means to weaken Israel and neither the land nor we as a Jewish people can afford that.

To all of you, a cordial Shanah Tovah Umetukah!

On Aug. 15, I wrote that a report on the Internet about a ban on shchitah in the Netherlands may have been a hoax. Jozef Vomberg of St. Catharines, Ont. informs me that shchitah of large steers was indeed banned for a time on a technicality, but has since been reinstated.

Finding my Judaism

They eyed me curiously from behind their mugs of beer and paper plates of chips, whispering among themselves, snatching glances in my direction. It took a little while before one of them finally came up to me at the Hillel orientation for university frosh.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

"Hi there. Are you Jewish?"

"Yeah, I guess so."

"Really? We've never seen you before at synagogue or at any of the Hillel activities. Or even at school for that matter. Where are you from? Are you sure you're Jewish?"

"Yes, I'm sure I'm Jewish!" I protested indignantly, but the problem was that I wasn't really all that sure. I was 18 years old, in my first year of university and, as clichéd as it may sound, trying to piece together who I really was.

Who was I to think that I could just step into this community of kids who had grown up together, reciting the Torah, learning Yiddish and Hebrew, going to the same day schools and navigating the same social circles?

Let me give you a little background about myself. For the next year, I will be writing this column from the perspective of a fifth-year student at the University of Calgary, where I am taking two bachelor's degrees in Russian and international business.

I've lived in Calgary for half of my of my 22 years, a born-and-raised Canadian of Russian descent. I can't remember when my parents first told me that I was Jewish, but it wasn't until I was at least 12 years old.

At age nine, I found a copy of The Diary of Anne Frank and started reading it voraciously, re-reading it every year and inevitably finding some new revelation in its pages.

I loved that book, identifying with it in ways I could not explain (beyond also being a teenage girl). Anne Frank was exotic and different, something other than myself – she was Jewish, just like someone else might be Korean or African-American, and she was definitely not part of my identity.

When my mother finally told me, almost apologetically, that I was Jewish, all I could think about, absurdly, was that I was now like Anne Frank.

Since then, I have been involved in many inner conflicts about my Jewish identity.

After all, my parents immigrated from a country where it was illegal to be religious and it was much worse to be Jewish. In Soviet Russia, the term "Jew" was stamped on their passports under the category of nationality, forever leaving them open to discrimination, human rights abuses and ridicule.

In Russia, it wasn't safe to be Jewish, and my parents carried that mentality with them to Canada.

I had no exposure to religion as a child and after that first terrifying Hillel encounter at university, I shied away from the Jewish community altogether.

I didn't know its customs and strange rituals, its holidays and campsites with the unpronounceable names, and I was terrified of how cliquey the community seemed to be and of the curiosity immediately fixated on me.

It wasn't until I was almost 20 years old that I finally began to test the waters of the Jewish community through a Birthright trip to Israel.

It was amazing to meet other Canadian Jews and to talk to Israelis at a time when suicide bombings were not everyday occurrences. It was also amazing to watch the sun set over Masada and try to let it sink in that – if I made the choice – Israel could be my new home.

Biting into my first falafel sandwich on Ben Yehuda Street, while letting the sauces drip over my chin, was memorable as well. But going to Yad Vashem and thinking about the senseless loss of life during the Holocaust while being struck by the remarkable resilience of the Jewish faith changed my reasoning permanently.

I realized that being a Jew is not something static, nor is it restricted to Anne Frank and kippot and not eating pork. It is an identity that can evolve and fluctuate, defined by what stage of life you are in and what area of the world you hail from.

Above all, I've learned that the Jews are a force to be reckoned with as they continue to survive, beating unbeatable odds. That's something I know for sure.

Hold on to dreams: they can become reality

Four walls, some windows, a kitchen yet to be koshered, and the hopes for vibrant Jewish student life in Halifax couldn't be higher. It wasn't even a year ago that the phrase "student bayit" was met with a skeptical chuckle. It was a grandiose dream with only a faint hope of being realized.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

So often the jokes get thrown around about idealistic youth in their university days. People reminisce about their own carefree times of the past. Everyone relates to that period in life when boundaries seem meaningless. Their hopes are high because they haven't yet been crushed by the "real world."

In university, the mind gets caught up in theory. As we venture into the depths of history, literature and philosophy in the lecture hall, we find ourselves looking towards an ideal. The revolutions of the past elicit a sense of duty for the future. It is only in the unique realm of university life that we can be so deeply ingrained in the theoretical. The mind – power and reason – can rectify any dilemma.

It is also the time of visions. We want to see the possibilities that may arise rather than the inadequacies that currently exist. We risk the laughter and even mockery of our elders because we can still cling to the thought that perhaps our aspirations will one day be met.

Sometimes, that's all it takes: having the ability to stand firm and think that things can work out for the best.

Less than a year ago, the "dream" for a meeting place for Jewish students at Dalhousie University was appreciated, but hardly taken seriously. Now, we just have to buy the pots to get the chicken soup boiling. Both convenient timing and the generosity of the Jewish community of Halifax and individuals in Toronto allowed this project to take off, but it was the belief in the importance of fostering Jewish student life on campus that provided the impetus for action. With every speech explaining our needs, we asserted the nobility of our cause and proved the strength of our convictions. The motivation to prevail and to advocate the importance of this project could not have existed unless there was some hope that we would succeed. That hope belonged to the optimism that has not yet been jaded by experience.

It is easy to succumb to doubt, to wonder if the struggles will ever produce something. The moments of defeat always seem to crush the victories. The challenges seem never-ending – that is, until something big enough happens, something that proves youthful idealism can produce results. When that happens, the struggle is a little bit easier. The problems are not as disconcerting as they once were because there is light at the end of the proverbial tunnel.

Really, the bayit is just a house: a bunch of rooms right near Dalhousie. But now that it's ours, we have a foundation of our own. Every face of shock in response to the news of our success solidifies the sense of accomplishment we can share with the community.

These years are tough. Being free isn't always as easy as it seems. The more options, the more decisions to be made; the grander the dreams, the greater the challenge of accomplishing them. The thing is, now is the time when we have to believe that dreams can be realized.

As the new year approaches, it is easy to think that another year will pass by like all the others. There is little to make us think that the obstacles of the past will disappear in the future. A group of disinterested students will not suddenly wake up and run to synagogue. And when you spend your days trying to market a product that is considered outdated and unwanted by many, it can be tough to find the motivation to do so. Insecurity sets in, and you have to wonder if things will really be different with a flip of the calendar page.

This year, though, there is a hope for us that never existed before. As Rosh Hashanah approaches, we can celebrate an added sweetness. We have reason to believe we can evoke change. We can appreciate this phase of our lives and understand that we must cherish our dreams. As long as we have goals to reach for, there is no reason to give up.

The Kirshner File

The Liberty incident: case of mistaken identity

On the early afternoon of June 8, 1967, the Liberty, a U.S. intelligence-gathering ship disguised as a "technical research" vessel, was strafed by Israeli aircraft and torpedo boats in international waters off the coast of the Sinai Peninsula, near the town of El Arish. Thirty four Americans were killed and 171 were wounded in the unprovoked attack, which occurred on the fourth day of the Six Day War.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The incident, which earned the ship's captain, William McGonagle, the Medal of Honor, has been the subject of 13 official investigations by the American and Israeli governments, a few books, five television documentaries and a gaggle of conspiracy theories.

Although the United States exonerated Israel, concluding that the attack was a tragic case of mistaken identity caused by the convergence of Israeli and American mistakes, the incident has yet to be laid to rest.

The Liberty Veterans Association is requesting another congressional study, even though five have been conducted in the past 35 years, and the U.S. Navy newspaper, Navy Times, recently reported that 88.6 per cent of its readers want a new investigation.

So the controversy lingers on.

A. Jay Cristol, a U.S. federal judge who spent 38 years in the navy, 18 as an aviator and 20 in the navy's Judge Advocate General Corps, has written a book that should, based on the facts, silence discordant voices who claim that it was a deliberate attack.

The Liberty Incident (Brassey's, Inc.) is nothing if not thorough. In writing this persuasive book, Cristol compiled a mountain of telling data and interviewed more individuals directly involved in the incident than any other previous researcher.

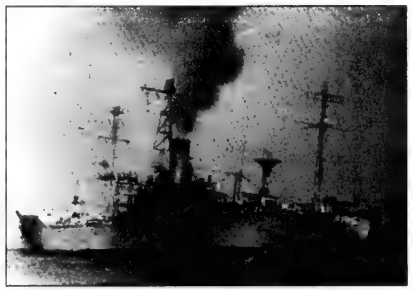
He points out that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff directed the Liberty to remain 100 nautical miles off the combat zone. The Joint Chiefs sent McGonagle five such stand-off messages, but as a result of mistakes, faulty protocols and technical problems with the U.S. military's communications system, he did not get any of them.

Furthermore, Ernest Castle, the American naval attaché in Israel in 1967, warned Washington to exercise caution, since Israeli forces in and around El Arish had been shelled from the sea by Egypt.

Writers who claim that the assault was premeditated cite the fact that the Liberty was flying the Stars and Stripes. But a U.S. Navy Court of Inquiry stated: "The calm conditions and slow ship speed may well have made the American flag difficult to identify." In a separate message, Admiral John McCain, commander of U.S. naval forces in Europe, observed that weather conditions "produced insufficient relative wind for steaming colors to be seen by pilots." He concluded: "The attack... was... a mistake."

Israel, having sent an airplane to scan the Mediterranean Sea after the shelling, was aware that the Liberty was in the vicinity. Uri Mertez, an officer in naval intelligence, told his colleagues that the Liberty was similar in appearance to the El-Quseir, an Egyptian vessel. He warned them not to mix up the two ships. Having conveyed this message, Mertez went off duty. Then, somehow or other, his warning did not make it through the chain of command.

The Americans initially feared that the Liberty had been attacked by the Soviet Union. On June 2, six days before the Liberty was strafed, U.S. Air Force fighter-bombers accidentally bombed the Turkestan, a Soviet merchant ship anchored in the North Vietnamese port of Cam Pha. Was this payback by Moscow? Before firm conclusions about Soviet perfidy could be drawn, the Israelis informed the Americans that they had attacked the Liberty, and apologized profusely.



The Liberty following the June 8 attack

Dean Rusk, the U.S. secretary of state, was furious. He branded the attack as irresponsible. Clark Clifford, a key member of president Lyndon Johnson's administration, conducted an inquiry. His 1967 report, declassified in 1995, reached several conclusions. The Israeli high command, while guilty of "gross and inexcusable failures," had not carried out a premeditated attack.

Within a month of the incident, the American media was on the case. Newsweek reported that the navy "turned up no evidence to indicate the attack was anything but a tragic blunder." In a subsequent edition, Newsweek quoted U.S. secretary of defence Robert McNamara as saying that the strafing was "unintentional."

Captain William McGonagle

Shortly afterward, an Israeli court of inquiry, headed by Yeshayahu Yerushalmi, concluded that the Liberty was attacked because of its uncanny resemblance to an Egyptian supply ship.

As Cristol observes, the history of warfare is replete with "friendly fire" incidents. During World War I, a British ship sank a British submarine, and in World War II, a German bomber sank two German destroyers at a cost of 578 lives.

More to the point, four Israeli Mystere fighters attacked a British destroyer during the 1956 Sinai war, mistaking it for an Egyptian vessel. On the first and fourth days of the Six Day War, the Israeli Air Force strafed and bombed Israeli armour and troops.

And in 1995, U.S. jets shot down two U.S. Black Hawk helicopters in northern Iraq. When Cristol asked Thomas Krupp – the American naval attache in Tel Aviv from 1989 to 1990 – if he had an opinion about the Liberty affair, he replied: "The only time I was wounded during my naval career was on April 16, 1972, while serving on the destroyer Worden off Vietnam. The Worden was attacked by U.S. Air Force F-4 aircraft."

McGonagle, whose gallantry on the bridge of the Liberty was cited when Johnson conferred the Medal of Honor on him, described the incident as an example of "gross incompetence and aggravated dereliction of duty on the part of many officers and men of the state of Israel."

James Ennis, an officer on the Liberty and author of Assault on the Liberty: The True Story of the Israeli Attack on an American Intelligence Ship (1976), accused Israel of "deliberate, premeditated murder."

He is not the only writer who has cast aspersions on Israel's motives. In 1984, in Taking Sides: America's Secret Relations with a Militant Israel, Stephen Green hypothesized that Israel attacked the Liberty so as to draw attention away from Arab allegations that the U.S. Air Force supported Israel during the Six Day War. James Bamford, in The Puzzle Palace (1982), claimed that Israel strafed the Liberty to hush up its impending plan to conquer the Golan Heights.

These conspiracy theories were thoroughly dismissed by the U.S. government.

Rear Admiral Isaac Kidd, the president of a naval court of inquiry, said that the attack was "a case of mistaken identity." (His superior, Thomas Moorer, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1970 to 1974, refused "to swallow" Israel's story.)

The Central Intelligence Agency similarly concluded that the attack was an error. Yet in a current edition of Middle East International, Richard Helms, the CIA director at the time, claims that "it was no accident."

Cristol, after examining the mounds of evidence, concludes that it is simply inconceivable that Israel, a trusted ally, would have jeopardized its pivotal relationship with the United States to attack the Liberty.

As he puts it: "There is an old U.S. Marine Corps adage that is perhaps appropriate here. 'Never attribute to malice that which can be explained by stupidity.'"

Truer words were never spoken.

Jewish National Fund of Toronto 2002 Negev Dinner

Announcement

Frank A. Wilson, President of the Jewish National Fund of Toronto, is pleased to announce on behalf of the Board of Directors that the 2002 Negev Dinner Honourees are Saul and Toby Feldberg. They are distinguished citizens of our community.

Toby and Saul Feldberg

The 54th Annual JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will take place at the downtown Sheraton Centre Hotel on Sunday, December 1st, in the Grand Ballroom. Details, tickets, information and reservations are available by contacting the offices of JNF Toronto by telephone 416-638-7200, by fax 416-638-7345 or by email at tor@jnf-canada.org.

The major project in Israel which will benefit from the proceeds of this tribute to the Feldbergs is Halochem Park in the Haruvit Forest. This special project for physically challenged veterans of the Israel Defence Forces and for disabled civilians will permit these individuals and their families to enjoy picnic and recreation areas in the forest. For those seeking to spend a quiet day in the realm of nature, Halochem Park will be a welcome respite. The Park will be located in the centre of the country, between Beit Shemesh and the Re'em Junction. The Halochem Park will occupy approximately 300 dunams within the larger forest area. Its facilities will be designed to meet the needs of the disabled.

Saul and Toby were both born in Poland and both families were, of course, greatly affected by the war and its aftermath. The Feldbergs - Saul's parents, his brother and himself, as well as the Elsners - Toby's parents, her sister and herself, found new lives, first in Israel and finally in Canada.

Saul and Toby met in 1955 and married in 1957. They are the parents of four and the grandparents of five. David and his wife Elyssa have two beautiful daughters, Alexa and Jordy, while Janice and her husband, Jeff Bly, are the parents of Jake, Ashley and Sydney. Bernie is a bachelor while Joel, their youngest, recently married Melissa.

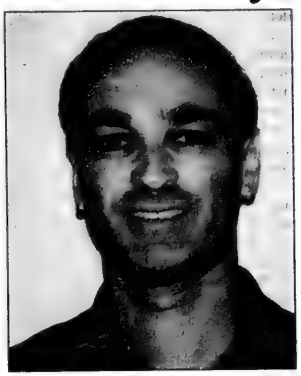
The companies which were established by Saul and Toby - Global and Teknion - are today a major force in the office furniture industry worldwide. All of the Feldberg children play a major role in these companies.

The Feldbergs support many charitable organizations in Canada and in Israel. They are active and recognized as leaders within the communal structure in Toronto. Toby currently serves as President of Beit Halochem Canada, an organization in Israel providing support and services to disabled veterans. The Feldbergs are members of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

A team of volunteer organizers and canvassers launched the Negev Dinner Campaign at the Feldberg home on September 4th. At that time, JNF President Frank A. Wilson inaugurated the Campaign, announcing that Campaign Co-Chairs will be Brent Belzberg, Jeff Blidner, David Koschitzky and Edward Sonshine, Q.C. Associate Campaign Co-Chairs will be Philip Feldberg, Ron Hoffman and Michael Serruya. Co-Chairs of the General Canvass are Alex Eisen, Frances Mandell, Jerry Werger, Judith Wilson and Vivienne Ziner. Almost two hundred volunteers, including the Dinner Executive, Tribute Committee and Campaign Team are working to make this event one of the best ever.

Beth Tzedec's new cantor composed musical score for Spielberg documentary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



Meir Finkelstein

For a cantor who's been serving congregations for 36 years, Meir Finkelstein looks remarkably youthful. His secret? He began his career at age 14.

On Aug. 1, Finkelstein became senior cantor at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, the largest Conservative congregation in North America with approximately 3,000 families.

A native of Israel who moved with his family to England at age 4, he followed in the footsteps of his father, Cantor Zvi Finkelstein, and his brother Aryeh, who is a cantor in Boston.

The two brothers sang with their father as children, and at 14, Meir was offered a position with a synagogue in Glasgow, where the family moved when he was 8.

At 16 he left Scotland for Newcastle, where he served as a cantor for two years while attending high school. Although he shared an apartment, he took all his meals with the rabbi's family.

By the time he was 18, Finkelstein had landed a position at Golders Green Synagogue, a major London congregation. While serving Golders Green, he studied singing, piano and composition at the Royal College of Music, graduating with honours.

The lyric tenor considered opera at one point, but he decided to focus instead on chazzanut and composing. During an 18-year stint at Sinai Temple in Westwood, Calif., he composed more than 100 synagogue works as well as a number of Hollywood pieces, including music for television movies and shows including Dallas and Falcon Crest.

With a congregation that included movie producers and people in the music industry, branching out in that direction was a natural evolution for Finkelstein.

He also wrote the musical score for Steven Spielberg's documentary, Survivors of the Shoah. (Spielberg was not one of his congregants.)

"It was a very fascinating experience and very difficult," said Finkelstein of the three-month project. "When you're scoring a film, you have to review the picture over and over, and obviously the subject matter when dealing with the Holocaust is very emotionally draining – but ultimately rewarding."

His most recent commission was a Jewish requiem called Nishmat Tzedek written for a full orchestra, chorus and soloist. It's being released worldwide to address the suffering of survivors of suicide bombings in Israel and Jewish survivor families of Sept. 11. The recording will be sent to them as a gift, he said.

He enjoys the variety of his composition work and attributes his style to an eclectic set of musical influences – among them the Beatles, Burt Bacharach, classical, opera, chassidic and cantorial music – when he was growing up.

What did his father think of the Beatles? "Not too much," Finkelstein replied.

His late father, a native of Transylvania who fought in Israel's War of Independence, preferred opera. Finkelstein's mother, Zipora, who was born in England, moved to Palestine with her family as a child, and now lives in Israel again.

Having lived and worked in different parts of the world, Finkelstein said the role of the chazzan in North America is very different to that in England or Europe, where the cantor leads services but is not otherwise as involved in congregational life as is the case here.

When he left England for a position in Chicago in 1974, the culture shock was "huge." In addition to taking on an expanded role, Finkelstein left an Orthodox congregation for a Conservative one. Later, in California, he served a fully egalitarian congregation in which women are counted in the minyan.

"I think, like everything else, once you get used to it, it ceases to be shocking," he said. "You accept as a matter of course that women are an integral part of the congregation and of Jewish prayer and services." At Beth Tzedec, women have been given aliyot unconditionally since 1994, but they are not counted in the minyan.

After a two-year sabbatical in Dallas, one of the things that drew Finkelstein and his wife Monica to Toronto was the Conservative Jewish lifestyle. "It seems to be a wonderful environment for raising children," said the father of a 4-year-old and a 3-year-old.

In services, worshippers will see a cantorial style that Finkelstein says has changed over the years. "I've moved away from the very traditional chazzanut to a much more modern, minimalist and expressive style that encourages participation."

New apartments designated for Jewish community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Somewhere along the way toward acquiring the building permit for a large rental apartment project, Russell Masters had an idea.

A vice-president of Tower Hill Development Corporation, Masters realized during negotiations with the City of Toronto that it might help expedite the approval process to designate some units at below-market rates because of a serious rental housing shortage.

"If we were going to do that, we wanted to designate it for our own community," Masters said in a recent phone interview.

The Kehilla Residential Program, a registered charity created in 1982 to identify and manage affordable housing initiatives, became involved in the project. Kehilla put Tower Hill in touch with UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service (JIS), which runs a housing registry.

Although Kehilla had been in contact with Tower Hill before regarding housing issues, this is their first joint project.

Along with 25 one- and two-bedroom suites designated in Tower Hill's existing building at 3000 Yonge St., 25 units have been designated at Rosewell Gardens, a planned rental complex near Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue.

Toronto is short 15,000 to 20,000 apartment units a year, Masters told The CJN. Only 22 new units were built last year, although an estimated 25 to 30 per cent of condominium units are rented out, he said.

For most builders, he explained, "it makes no sense [financially] to build apartments. That's why no one's done them in 25 years."

Tower Hill is building apartments on land it has owned for a long time, he explained.

New apartments will replace two-storey walk-up buildings that Masters' grandfather, Reuben Dennis, now 94, built in 1952. Groundbreaking is scheduled to take place Oct. 1, and the project is expected to take 18 months to complete.

Will replace two-storey walk-up buildings

"We think there is a huge middle-income market [of] working people who need a nice place to live," said Masters.

The new project would be "a good choice for somebody new to the workforce," said Barbara Barak, senior co-ordinator of JIS.

Of the designated units, one-bedroom apartments will lease for $863 a month, compared to a market rate of $975, while two-bedroom units – whose typical market rate would be $1,400 – will go for $1,033.

"It's ideal for the young Jewish community member, student, recent graduate or young professional," said Barak.

The apartments are being offered initially to members of the Jewish community. If there are not enough people within the Jewish community who qualify, they will be offered outside the community, said Barak.

For further information on the project, contact Barak or Fran Augenblick at 416-635-5600.

Hebrew University victims remembered

Feldman happened to run into Blutstein, her roommate's boyfriend, the night before he was killed. "Before we parted, he told me how excited he was to see his parents. He had a ticket for the next night. Unfortunately he flew home in a casket."

She recalled Blutstein as a serious Torah student by day and a charismatic DJ by night.

"He was full of energy and full of life.

Rothberg alumna Shari Golberg lit a memorial candle to honour Blutstein, Bennett, Ladowski and the six other victims: Revital Barashi, Dina Carter, Janis Ruth Coulter, David Gritz, Levina Shapira and Dafna Spruch.

Harley Mintz, president of CFHU's Toronto chapter, said the bombing brought the realization that there is "no safe place from terror."

Moshe Arad, the university's vice-president for development, said in a taped message that messages of support have been a source of great strength and encouragement.

"We are proud of being an island of sanity and tranquility," he said. "We are determined to continue to pursue our mission... and to serve as a bridge of co-existence."

Prof. Janice Stein, director of the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies, said Hebrew U has always stood for everything that's the opposite of terror. "From the early days, they took seriously their responsibility to use reason and carefully disciplined thought to find a way though the intractable conflict between Israelis and Palestinians."

She reminisced about her three-decade affiliation with Hebrew University and lamented in particular the loss of the director of the department of student affairs and the serious injuries to most of its staff members. The department will have to be rebuilt from scratch before the new academic year starts in October, Stein said.

Tracy Wilder, a 1988 alumna and past chair of CFHU New Leadership, called on those present to translate their feelings into action and support Israel in ways such as calling or e-mailing friends and family in Israel, buying Israeli products and giving tzedakah.

Israeli writers, academics face increasing isolation

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Some Israeli writers and academics are finding themselves unwelcome guests at international conferences and speaking engagements. Others are simply being left off the invitation list.

According to the Harbourfront Centre's Web site, the upcoming International Festival of Authors – which features Iranian writer Salmon Rushdie as the opening speaker – does not include any Israeli writers for its readings, although nine authors from Israel have appeared in previous years.

Greg Gatenby, the artistic director of the festival, said that Israeli authors were not invited this year because there haven't been many new Hebrew books translated into English.

"Politics were not a consideration," Gatenby said.

However, some Israeli scholars feel that when it comes to Israel, the only view welcome in academic and literary circles is either criticism or silence.

Haifa University law professor Amnon Reichman, who was visiting in Toronto recently, said that at some conferences, "the entire Israeli population is being branded as enemies of all humanity." If you challenge that outlook, you are attacked on all sides, he added.

The net effect is completely antithetical to the whole idea of academia, where ideas should be allowed to be presented so that the search for truth can proceed. The academic chill on alternative points of view silences Israeli voices that are pro-Israel, Reichman said.

"The most you can do is sit quietly because it becomes clear that if you don't join the anti-Israel view, you will not be listened to."

Michal Govrin is currently writer in residence at Rutgers University in New Jersey. Last summer, the poet and novelist faced academic anti-Semitism when her participation in a writers' festival in Hobart, Tasmania, was cancelled, the organizers said, "to protest against the killing of children."

After the intervention of the state premier, they re-invited her and she reluctantly set out on a trip to Australia, where she was generally ignored by the festival directors.

It was so ironic, she said, to come face to face with chilling hate, crazy accusations and open anti-Semitism in Tasmania, a place where the whites totally exterminated the aboriginal communities.

Instead of a simple literary tour, she found herself dealing with a new face of anti-Semitism and addressing "the deliberate deformation of language and information committed by writers or intellectuals" that legitimizes and encourages further acts of terrorism, she said.

In a phone interview from her home in Tel Aviv, Israeli writer Savyon Liebrecht told of similar experiences she had on a recent European book tour.

"In Germany, it felt as if I was constantly under attack," Liebrecht said.

Since Liebrecht's books deal with issues related to the Holocaust, she found that many of her interviewers focused on the current situation in Israel and compared it to the Shoah.

"They would ask me how I dared to speak about atrocities that happened 50 years ago and for which retribution has been paid without addressing what is going on in Israel today," Liebrecht said.

The writer noted there is a significant difference between her European tours – where most of her readers aren't Jewish – and her appearances in North America, where her audience is mainly Jewish.

Liebrecht said she was embraced by Israelis and Jews at a recent visit to the Hebrew College in Boston.

Reichman confirmed that academic anti-Semitism is currently more severe in Europe than in the United States or Canada.

"It's not a rare occurrence these days that you'll be at a European conference and academics will argue that Jews are not a legal entity and therefore don't have a right to a state."

No attention will be paid to the political realities facing Israelis and the Jewish people and their right to self determination – an issue that Reichman thought was resolved in the 1920s with the creation of the Balfour Declaration.

"What other country has to defend its right to exist over and over again?" Reichman asked.

As for the planned appearance of Rushdie at the Habourfront Festival, Liebrecht sighed and said, "Ah yes, but he's been forgiven. We haven't."

Book sales remain steady

Despite the cold shoulder being given to Israeli writers when they travel, sales of their books remain steady.

If anything there has been an increase in interest in Israel and its political situation since Sept. 11, said Gefen Publishing's Ilan Greenfield.

"Many more people around the world – Jews and non-Jews – are eager to learn the real story. They're tired of the CNN news which victimizes terrorists," Greenfield said.

Israeli writer Michal Govrin said the positive press coverage given to her efforts in Australia to address the attempted boycott of her presence may have actually increased the sales of her novel The Name.

"The audience and press reaction [to the attempted boycott]... was wonderful," Govrin said.

Nili Cohen, of the Institute for the Translation of Hebrew Literature, also said they have not noticed any serious decline in the sales of Israeli books.

"The market is a commercial arena – with the usual ups and downs," she said.

"In the long run, there might be a problem. But right now, we haven't seen it."

Benefits of a family newsletter

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Every year before Rosh Hashanah, Judith Caplan publishes about 225 copies of a family newsletter and sends them out around the world. The newsletter is titled My Multi-Mishpacha Missive and often runs to 24 pages, plus inserts. It is received enthusiastically in homes in the United States, Canada, England, Holland, Israel, Australia, South Africa and other countries.

Caplan, a former high school teacher in Long Island, N.Y., says the newsletter helps maintain a sense of unity between family branches that are far-flung geographically and whose various members might not have known about each other were it not for her painstaking investigations.

"I am knitting together the family – actually four families," she says. "I am keeping the generations interwoven so they think they know each other even if they don't ever see each other."

A popular feature of the newsletter is the Milestones page, which highlights births, marriages, anniversaries, bar and bat mitzvahs, graduations and other achievements.

"People like getting their names some place, they like getting something published about themselves," Caplan says. "And they like to read that this one graduated and that one had a baby."

Genealogists are often stymied when relatives who seem genuinely interested in the family procrastinate when asked for updates on their local branches. A family newsletter markedly improves the reply rate, Caplan says.

By keeping in regular touch and using the newsletter to give her research a higher profile, she receives an enviable level of co-operation and manages to generate fine team spirit. When proud relatives inform her of a milestone, she sends them a printout that lists members of their local branch, as well as an update card to fill in any blanks. Most reply promptly.

The newsletter also includes descriptions of Caplan's main areas of research and a research wish list, family photographs both new and old, thank-yous to supportive family members, suggestions for baby names, and plenty of e-mail addresses to facilitate greater correspondence between the branches.

Caplan foots almost the entire cost of the newsletter – about $500 (US) for printing and postage – but she figures she saves on Rosh Hashanah cards by sending New Year's greetings with the publication. The time requirement is also considerable, which is why she makes it a yearlong project and doesn't wait for August to start a new issue.

"Basically, I underwrite it," she says. "Some people give me some contributions, but it's my baby. It's mine. I choose to send it out. If someone wants to give me something, they will. I figure as long as they don't tell me not to send it, I'm doing well."

Despite the cost, the rewards can be enormous. Caplan enjoys the task and is confident her family tree is about as up-to-date as any genealogist could hope for. Then come the less tangible benefits associated with helping to repair the frayed tapestry of one's own family history. Earlier this summer, an Israeli Holocaust survivor saw her newsletter and came to New York to meet her. "She said, 'You gave me back my family. I thought there was no one left, that we were the last ones out,'" the genealogist recalls.

Caplan was one of many excellent speakers at the recent IAJGS Conference on Jewish Genealogy in Toronto. She is also the editor of an online journal about Litvak research (www.jewish gen.org).

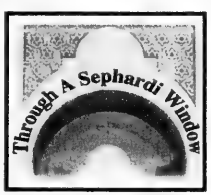
Keys without doors

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Officially, no Jews were left in Spain. As of August 1492, the last Jew in Spain was expelled forever.



Among the precious few belongings the Jews were able to carry with them were the keys to their homes. With these keys in hand, they held on to the hope of one day returning and reclaiming their estates. This, of course, never happened. Although, close to 500 years later, the edict of the expulsion was officially repealed, the Jews of Spain never returned. The keys, however, were passed from father to son. With the passing of the centuries, they became important only for their nostalgic value.

I possess one of these keys. A primitive skeleton key, covered in the fine red rust of more than half a millennium. It is a key to some door in Toledo, Spain. I am sure both the door and the estate it locked are long gone. Still, the key hangs in my library, proudly framed for what it represents to me.

This fall, on Oct. 14, the World Sephardi Federation will reunite the descendants of those expelled Jews of Spain at a conference in Granada.

The official insignia for this conference is the Hebrew letter samach, together with one of these keys superimposed over it. Samach presumably stands for Sepharad (Spain) or Sephardi (Spanish Jew).

While this conference holds much promise, I am reminded of a different and very opposite point of view held by some of the expelled Jews. They chose not to carry the keys to their estates with them. In fact, after being unceremoniously kicked out of their homes, they undertook to never return. Legend has it that the origin of the common Sephardi name Toledano is "Toledo no," meaning "there we will never again come back."

This second group and their outlook proved to be forward looking. History has sided with this point of view. It is one that speaks of the future, one that says life continues, things do not remain static, one moves on and one should not, like Lot's wife, look back, only ahead.

There is a time for looking back, if that looking back is forward-centered. We look back to understand who we are, from where we came and hopefully to where we are heading.

Rosh Hashanah is this sort of time – to look back, but to do so in only the most forward of ways. Yes indeed, review the year past, carry on with what was positive and worthwhile in it, and discard what was not. Welcome change with an embrace, for change is a growth opportunity.

The Jews of Spain did not disappear, they dispersed. They settled in North Africa, the Mediterranean basin, the Balkans, the land of Israel and even parts of Eastern Europe such as Hungary and Romania. Their rich tapestry of traditions, language, foods and music all live on, even if their estates are long gone.

May the Almighty bring us health, peace and prosperity in this new year.

Hailing Brooklyn

Jews of Brooklyn*, edited by Ilana Abramovitch and Sean Galvin, Brandeis University Press, 2001, $40 (US).

Books
Bernard Baskin

When I'm asked where I grew up, I answer proudly and without hesitation, "Brooklyn." When I was about ten, my father became rabbi of a large modern Orthodox synagogue in Brooklyn's Williamsburg section. This was long before the arrival of Chassidim and Puerto Ricans in the area. Our family shook off the relative small-town tranquility of New Brunswick, N.J., and entered a maelstrom of hectic Jewish activity. Brooklyn had a Jewish population of close to one million and its influence was ubiquitous.

On the eve of Passover, the street we lived on was punctuated by small fires as families burned their bread prior to the beginning of the festival.

When Sukkot arrived, my father provided the biblically ordained four species of the festival for congregational members. My brother and I delivered the packages, including lulav and etrog. We vigorously vied for the tips where we knew they would be most generously offered. At the end of the holiday, the schach that was used to cover the sukkahs littered the neighbourhood, the wind blowing the branches in every direction.

Purim was highlighted by the constant arrival of mishloach manot gifts to our home. My mother selected items from the various baskets and bowls to create new and attractive mishloach manot arrangements of her own. It was an impressive balancing and measuring act, based on long experience.

On the second afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, we observed tashlich from the heights of the Williamsburg Bridge, the towers of Manhattan looming in the distance.

My father was a formidable scholar. Whenever he entered the sanctuary, row after row of congregants rose halfway in their seats. It was like a pious wave of respect and esteem. Is this tradition still observed anywhere?

Not long after moving to Williamsburg, I became a student at Yeshiva Torah Vodaath just a few blocks from my home. Etched in memory are the teacher strikes that periodically occurred. Without warning, the underpaid harassed teachers refused to enter their classrooms. In response, the exultant students streaked through the corridors shouting, "Strike, strike." It was a heart-warming cry. Usually, after a few days of frenzied financial wrangling, the reluctant students trooped back to school.

These bittersweet reminiscences arise from reading Jews of Brooklyn, an evocative anthology of 40 essays by historians, scholars, folklorists and poets who explore the diversity of the Jewish experience in New York City's most populous borough over the past century.

This oversized book deals with all aspects of Brooklyn's Jewish life – political, social and religious – from the conservative to the radical, from the religious to the secular.

Brooklyn has nurtured enormous Jewish talent. The following are just a few of the world-famous personalities who were either born or raised there: Woody Allen, Danny Kaye, Robert Merrill, Barbara Streisand, Joseph Heller and Norman Mailer.

In addition to its wide-ranging content, Jews of Brooklyn has a wealth of expertly selected photographs that stimulate the mind as they attract the eye.

Rosh Hashanah music

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It may not boast catchy tunes like Chanukah's Maoz Tzur or Passover's Dayeinu, but Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur have some of the most inspiring melodies found in Jewish liturgy. As we approach the Days of Awe, you can listen to some of the tunes that will soon be heard in synagogues around the world.

There are several sites where you can listen to the moving music of the High Holy Days. The Cantors Institute Choir presents renditions of Aleinu and Hayom Harat Olam ("Today is the birth of the universe") sung in the Musaf prayers on Rosh Hashanah after the shofar is sounded. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/arts/audhhday/] For a Sephardi version of some Rosh Hashanah tunes, go to the following page and scroll down about halfway to hear Los Angeles' Yosef Dweck Selichot (prayers of forgiveness) and piyutim (liturgical poems) for the month of Elul, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. [http://www.613.org/music/niggun.html]

The best site that I have found that allows you to listen to Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur music belongs to Temple Sholom of Cedar Grove, N. J. You can listen to many tunes including Avinu Malkeinu ("Our Father, Our King,) Zochreinu ("Remember Us") and the haunting Unetaneh Tokef. [http://sholom.net/rosh_hashana_music-5761.htm]

The words of Unetaneh Tokef are famous: "On Rosh Hashanah will be inscribed and on Yom Kippur will be sealed how many will pass from the earth and how many will be created; who will live and who will die…" [http://www.ou.org/chagim/roshhashannah/unetaneh.html]. The poem is attributed to Rabbi Amnon who lived in Mainz, Germany about 1,000 years ago. Rabbi Ammon had been repeatedly summoned by the Bishop of Mainz to convert to Christianity. Eventually, the bishop had Rabbi Amnon's hands and feet cut off for refusing to convert. Tradition has it that after Rabbi Amnon died of his injuries, he appeared in a dream to Rabbi Kalonymous ben Meshullam and taught him the text of the prayer. You can read a detailed version of the Unetaneh Tokef story on the Web.

A version of Unetaneh Tokef entered popular culture in 1974 when Leonard Cohen released Who By Fire. [http://www.leonardcohensite.com/prologues/who_by_fire.htm]

"…And who by brave assent, who by accident, who in solitude, who in this mirror, who by his lady's command, who by his own hand, who in mortal chains, who in power, and who shall I say is calling?"

Cohen explained that he derived his song "from the melody which I heard when I was sat in a synagogue. And of course the ending of my song is something different. Who shall I say is calling? – This is my kind of prayer: Who is it, or what is it, which determines man's life?" [http://www.medialab.chalmers.se/guitar/who.by.fire.html]

Most Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur music is quite solemn. But for something a bit different – and very lively – listen to Uman, Uman, Rosh Hashana. [http://www.breslovcenter.com/article_RHinUman.html] Uman, Ukraine is the resting place of Rabbi Nachman of Breslov (1772-1810). Every year, thousands of Breslover Chassidim from around the world make the pilgrimage to Uman to honour and celebrate their Rebbe. You can listen to a joyous and generous excerpt from their album online. [http://www.breslov.com/music/] The same page also has Breslover renditions of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur prayers that date back to the time of the Ba'al Shem Tov in the 18th century.

It may be quite unorthodox but every Rosh Hashanah since 1997, thousands of Israelis have been getting together in the Megiddo Forest to celebrate the holiday with a different kind of music. [http://info.jpost.com/C001/Supplements/RoshHashana/green.html] The Bereshit Festival presents international artists along with Carlebach-influenced Jewish soul music and areas for meditation, tai chi and yoga. One of the regulars at the festival is Rabbi Mordechai Gafni. Asked why he attends the festival, the rabbi answers: "When you have 20,000 people of my family getting together for a Rosh Hashana meal, wherever they are, I'll be there. It's about family."

Shanah Tovah.

England passes Get law in Canada's and New York's footsteps

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

According to the Yiddish newspaper the Forverts (Yiddish Forward), England's Parliament recently passed a law to help Jewish women obtain a religious divorce ("Get") to enable them to remarry more easily. The newspaper further reports that Jonathan Sachs, the chief Rabbi of England, is happy with the law which "gives the courts the right to require from a couple a religious Get before the Court will grant a civil divorce."

I congratulate all the hard-working English men and women who promoted this new law. It took them many years and a great deal of effort in the face of considerable resistance.

Canada's role in pioneering Get legislation

The law mirrors New York State law, where the idea originated with the noted American jurist, lawyer Nathan Lewin, and others in the early 1980s. We in Canada had such legislation enacted in the Divorce Act of 1991, and in Ontario's Family Law Act as early as 1986!

However, in Canada, a spouse has to raise the issue of his or her need for a religious divorce from her spouse before a Court will prevent the civil divorce from being granted. In 1985/86 and in 1990/91, I had the privilege of drafting and promoting this legislation on behalf of the Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto and B'nai Brith Canada. These groups successfully trailblazed this initiative to assist primarily those Jewish women whose husbands were attempting to extort money or other "rights" in exchange for their consent to a Get.

Since then, the incidence of "Get abuse" has shrunk dramatically. The Canadian legislation goes further than the English and the American: the "blackmailing" spouse can lose rights to property, money and even custody or access to children if he or she refuses to consent to a Get. The Canadian Courts have that power vested in them by Parliament and the Ontario legislature.

Consequences of refusing to grant a Get

The Canadian Jewish Congress, various women's groups and over 50 religious denominations across Canada, including the Catholic Church, ultimately supported the Orthodox Rabbis and B'nai Brith. So did the great constitutional lawyer (now deceased), J.J. Robinette.

They did so for a reason. Without a Get, a Jewish woman is unable to remarry within the Jewish faith. This means that if she gets a Canadian civil (secular) divorce — but not a religious one — then any children with her new husband would be considered under Jewish law as "illegitimate" or "mamzerim". Mamzerim can only marry other mamzerim or converts, and this rules applies to their children and their children's children into the 10th generation!

Under traditional Jewish law, Rabbis and synagogues are mandated not to permit marriages between mamzerim and other Jews. There are even mamzer societies that attempt to locate prospective spouses for such people.

Not only are many observant Jewish woman unable to remarry, they also cannot even date or allow themselves to be alone with a man. They become socially isolated and ostracized, "chained" to their estranged husband indefinitely. Such women are called "agunah" or "agunot" (plural). It is the duty of every Jew to help such women by doing whatever is necessary to persuade their husbands to give a Get, and to do so without conditions.

Ostracization of the agunot

According to Jewish law, the Torah also prevents any Rabbi from granting a "Get" or from making a ruling to circumvent the need to obtain the husband's consent to a Get.

In the Torah, it is one of our 613 Mitzvot to give a Get, when one is called upon to do so. The refusal to do so is no less a sin than stealing, adultery or failing to keep a Kosher diet.

A Jewish court can punish a man for refusing to consent to a Get, but those powers do not realistically exist outside of the State of Israel. In Israel, a man who refuses to grant a Get can be jailed or have his licenses to work or property rights compromised. In specific circumstances (not all), a Jewish man visiting Israel who refuses to grant a Get can be restrained from leaving Israel until he does so, even if he is not an Israeli citizen! (This has actually occurred).

By contrast, in certain situations, a Jewish man can remarry without a Get if he obtains a rabbinical ruling called a "heter", although this practice is frowned upon by the Jewish court in Toronto and is not practiced widely in Canada. It is extremely difficult to obtain such a "heter". Even when Rabbis permit such a procedure, they usually do so on the condition that the husband provide his consent to a Get at the same time. Otherwise, the woman would be left "stranded." Since obtaining such a heter is so difficult (and expensive), a number of men have also resorted to using Canadian law to enable them to remarry religiously.

New Year a time for compassion

As we approach Rosh Hashanah, it is gratifying to see that England is following in the footsteps of Canada and New York. As Canadians, we should all take some satisfaction in having contributed to help the agunot.

At this time of year, we should all pray that the Holy One, Blessed be He, bring an end to their plight. In the meantime, as we pound our chests while in shul this Yom Kippur, we should think of the agunah and commit ourselves to help anyone in our community in her situation (or his). Give her comfort and solace. Do not leave her stranded and ostracized.

And if you are in a position to do so, try to persuade a "blackmailing" or "difficult" spouse to do what is right.

On behalf of myself, my family, B'nai Brith Canada and the firm of Basman Smith, I wish you a Happy and Healthy New Year.

globe as dormant strains of anti-Semitism stirred, cascaded their way through Muslim and Arab lands, Europe and even to the streets of our cities here in Canada. Two years later, neither the war nor the anti-Semitic fallout shows signs of abating.

As Jews, we knew all too well that what connected Durban and the horrific terrorist acts of Sept. 11 was the truism that evil words lead to evil deeds. Without abandoning their intention to deny Jews equal rights, anti-Semites of the 21st century – be they Islamists, radical Arab nationalists or neo-Nazis – go one step further: they delegitimize the world's only Jewish State.

On Rosh Hashanah, we commemorate the anniversary of creation, Brit HaOlam. At this time of personal reflection and retrospection, it is hard to ignore the tumultuous events that coincided with this period in the last two years, the ramifications of which are still being felt daily, most severely of course by our Israeli brothers and sisters. It is from their heroism and courage that we draw our inspiration and our unshakable confidence in the perpetual triumph of the State of Israel over the forces arrayed against it. We do so because Israel and the Jewish people, Zionism and Judaism, are inextricably intertwined as part of a single body. Israel is the fulfilment of Jewish destiny and the culmination of the Jewish people's striving for liberation, self-determination and self-realization. Its re-establishment was an act of national redemption, successfully undoing the tragic condition that made of our people the perennially most persecuted minority in history. An attack on one is an attack on the other. Both are anti-Semitism.

It is the task of Jewish defence to preserve the status of Jewish communities as integral parts of their societies and the only Jewish State as an integral part of the community of nations. Many have to be reminded what they seem to have forgotten: that though anti-Semitism begins with the Jews, it never ends with them. The ultimate aim or consequence of anti-Semitism is the destruction of pluralistic democracies. Ridding the world of it, therefore, is a part of defending the democratic values that Canadians and Israelis cherish and share.

Rosh Hashanah ushers in the Yamim Nora'im, a time for spiritual renewal through prayer and self-examination. We ask forgiveness and make amends as we acknowledge our sins and strive to correct our faults. Especially in these difficult times, we draw comfort from our faith, the traditions that we treasure and those that we hold most dear – our families and friends, Israel and Canada. Despite the problems confronting us, we are secure in the knowledge that as we face the challenges, our people, in Israel and in the Diaspora, are as strong, united and resolute as at any time in our history.

Let us pray for peace in Israel and for a better world. I wish you all a sweet year and a meaningful fast.

community responded with devotion, vigour and passion. Without hesitation, thousands of us reached deeply to provide generous donations for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which is still underway. In fact, gift increases have reached historic highs, allowing us to send millions to help meet Israel's extraordinary needs and also look after the vulnerable members of our Jewish community.

This year proved that we, the Jewish people, truly believe in ourselves and in the timeless values that have sustained us for thousands of years. This past year of strife and sorrow demonstrated our strength and our resolve to overcome obstacles standing in the way of our survival. It showed that we are truly stronger together.

On behalf of UJA Federation, we wish you, your loved ones and the entire Jewish people a year of health, happiness and peace.

In an effort to put some of this debate into its historical context, this lecture will re-examine one crucial piece of evidence — a confidential diplomatic report to Marshal Philippe Petain, the French head of state, which reveals much, not only about Vatican attitudes but also about the French leadership of the anti-Jewish campaign that immediately preceded the Holocaust.

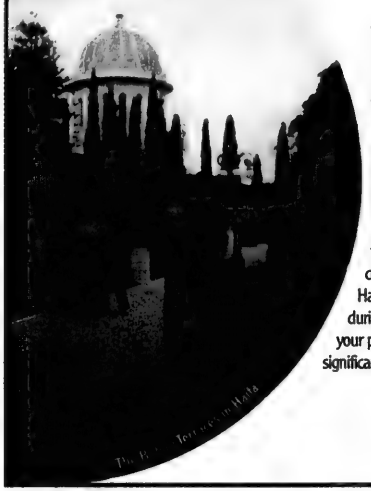
DISCOVER ISRAEL

So What's New this New Year?



Israel. No matter how many times you visit our modern and ancient nation, it feels like the first time. But there are actually many new events, sites and attractions to captivate tourists. The first step is a renewed commitment this Rosh Hashana to visit Israel during difficult days when your presence will make a significant difference in every way. Now, let's check out what's new.

The Davidson Center, Jerusalem Take a spectacular step back to the Temple Period of Israeli life at this extension of Jerusalem's Archaeological Park near the Old City's Southern Wall excavations. Here in this ironically high-tech facility - just over a year old - view excavated remains from the Roman era and a computer-generated film about life in Temple times.

The Israeli Children's Museum, Holon – Open since March of last year, just south of Tel Aviv, this museum is structured the way kids like it. You won't find "do not touch" signs here because that's what kids are supposed to do – touch and even enter the exhibits in this 40,000 square foot building where learning and fun go hand in hand.

The Baha'i Terraces – High atop Haifa's Mt. Carmel, 19 terraced gardens create one of the world's most stunning sites. Built by the Baha'i World Centre, headquarters of the Baha'i faith, the terraces – officially opened last year – stretch 225 meters up the mountain, complementing the magnificent flower displays that had lured tourists for decades.

Getting to Israel this coming year couldn't be easier. Contact the Israel Government Tourist Office for a compete list of group missions and individual travel options.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

To you, your families and the entire Jewish people a healthy, happy and peaceful New Year. Shana Tova.

Yacoubov made her mark in the Jewish community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Fran Yacoubov was not a high-powered community leader, but her personal warmth and depth of community involvement were reflected in an unusually large attendance at her funeral.

Obituary

Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker, who delivered a comprehensive eulogy, noted afterward that the crowd of 1,100 was more typical for the funeral of a dignitary.

Yacoubov, the former national administrative director of Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU) died Aug. 14 of a massive heart attack. She was 48.

Fran Yacoubov

For the past six years she served as administrator at the Toronto Heschel School, but Rabbi Pinsker, who was the school's first president, said in reality Yacoubov served as guidance counselor for students, parents and staff. She was known for taking out-of-towners under her wing and offering wisdom and comfort to people who confided in her.

"The children gave her such a great deal of satisfaction," her husband Haim told The CJN. "She used to talk with them like they were all her children." In addition to the couple's own three boys, there were always other kids at the Yacoubov house. "They were just happy here," he said.

"We are grieving terribly at Heschel," said school principal Gail Baker, who knew Yacoubov as a fellow hockey mom at Goulding Park Community Centre before the school opened. "She gave of her time to everything that she believed in [and] she always made a point of getting to know people."

Yacoubov conveyed a sense "that life was a delight," said Rabbi Pinsker in his eulogy. "No challenge, no task, no situation seemed insurmountable; no moment was empty of reasons for optimism about the future."

A high point in her work at CFHU was being interviewed by Barbara Walters about her work organizing a fundraising dinner honouring television personality Monty Hall, the rabbi said.

She also served as president of the board of Gan Yeladim Day Care Centre for 10 years and stayed on as a volunteer long after her children had finished attending, Shelley Wise told The CJN.

A native of Toronto, Fran Yasny graduated from Northview Heights Secondary School before leaving to live in Israel in 1973. It was there that she met her husband. They celebrated their 25th anniversary in July.

Yacoubov is survived by Haim, children Yoni, Jordie and Jesse, her mother Lilian Yasny and her sisters Adele Wootton, Karen McElroy and Lisa Comeau. A Web memorial was in the process of being set up last week at www.lifetimes.ca.

Gitai premiers Israeli film Kedma

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Kedma, a feature film from Israeli director Amos Gitai, will be premiered at this year's Toronto International Film Festival, which runs until Sept. 14.

It's the story of European Jewish refugees who arrive in Palestine only a week before David Ben-Gurion – Israel's first prime minister – proclaims statehood in May 1948.

Toronto International Film Festival

The film turns on the opposition the refugees face from British forces based in Palestine.

Gitai is best known for Kadosh, which examines the lives of a troubled haredi couple in Jerusalem, and Kippur, which is set during the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Apart from Kedma, films of Jewish interest include Nowhere in Africa, Blind Spot: Hitler's Secretary, Max, Fuhrer Ex, The Trials of Henry Kissinger, La Derniere Lettre, Frida and Ticket to Jerusalem.

Written and directed by Caroline Link, Nowhere in Africa is adapted from an autobiographical novel by Stefanie Zweig.

It's about a middle-class Jewish family from Nazi Germany that settles on a farm in Kenya during World War II.

Blind Spot: Hitler's Secretary, by Andre Heller and Othmar Schmiderer, describes, for the first time, the career of Traudl Junge, Adolf Hitler's private secretary from 1942 onward.

Hitler dictated his last will and testament to Junge, whose exposure to Nazism apparently left her with a vehement hatred for the Nazis.

Max, directed by Menno Meyjes and starring John Cusack and Noah Taylor, is about Max Rothmann, a promising German Jewish artist who, after losing an arm in World War I, opens an avant-garde art gallery.

There he meets an aspiring artist named Adolf Hitler, who dreams of greatness. Rothmann takes Hitler under his wing as his protégé. But as Hitler comes under the influence of racist ideas, his friendship with Rothmann crumbles.

Traudl Junge

Fuhrer Ex is based on a book by Ingo Hasselbach, a young man from eastern Germany who was attracted to neo-Nazism before repudiating it. The film's director is Winfried Bonegel.

The Trials of Henry Kissinger, by Eugene Jarecki, claims the former American secretary of state committed war crimes in Cambodia, East Timor and Chile in the 1970s. Based on a polemical book by left-of-centre journalist Christopher Hitchens, this is nothing if not an irreverent film.

Frederick Wiseman's La Derniere Lettre takes place on the eve of Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union and revolves around a Jewish doctor and her son.

Frida, directed by Julie Taymor and starring Salma Hayek, probes the turbulent life of the half-Jewish Mexican artist Frida Kahlo, whose mentor and husband, Diego Rivera, was an icon in Latin American art.

In Ticket to Jerusalem, Palestinian filmmaker Rashid Masharawi uses the medium of cinema to portray the political volatility of Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank.

This year's festival will present 344 films from 50 countries, Piers Handling, the festival's director, announced at a press conference.

There will be 31 Canadian features and 27 Canadian shorts, including co-productions.

Police, community groups discuss security

Representatives from Jewish organizations across Toronto met recently at the offices of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, to discuss ways of improving security at schools, synagogues and other Jewish facilities.

Presentations were made by Det. Stephen Irwin, a member of the anti-terrorist and threat investigations unit of Toronto Police Services, and Doron Kay, a vice-president and partner of a private security firm in Toronto. Both agreed that the community must remain proactive to ensure its continuing safety.

Also in attendance were representatives from six major law enforcement agencies and a police officer from New York who is participating in an exchange program between Toronto Police Services and the New York City Police Department.

Security meetings are hosted by CJC, Ontario region, on an annual basis as part of its mandate to assist the community in developing effective security.

New organization for women aims to unite all Toronto Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A new group for women called One-One-One aims to unite Jewish Torontonians from all backgrounds in solidarity with Israel during these troubled times.

To that end, One-One-One is planning programs in Orthodox, Conservative and Reform synagogues. Its first program, which will be held Thursday, Sept. 12 at 8 p.m. at Chabad of Markham, will include videos, eyewitness accounts from victims of the intifadah, the recitation of Psalms and refreshments.

One-One-One, which stands for One Hour, One Prayer, One Purpose, is also planning programs at Shaar Shalom and Temple Har Zion in October.

The organizers, including Lynn Catzman, Jeanette Berger, Anna Mae Belmont and Marilyn Taitez, want to encourage education about Israeli history and current affairs.

They plan to respond to media reports and statements by politicians, to support Israel's economy, to support organizations providing services and comfort to victims of terror and their families, to keep in touch with family and friends in Israel and to recite Psalms every day.

In a recent interview with The CJN, the organizers talked about their accomplishments so far and their future goals. They have gone to several supermarkets, including the Hilda and Clark Sobey's in Thornhill, to put identifying stickers on Israeli products.

They want to encourage people to buy gas from companies that purchase their stock from non-Arab sources, to send condolence cards and correspond with families who have lost members to terror, to visit Israel, to respond to media misinformation and compliment accurate reporting and to donate to, and invest in, Israel.

Programs can be arranged in private homes, so that small groups of women can recite Psalms together, discuss what they can do and hear about what is happening in Israel. Kits are currently being prepared with suggestions for taking action, a list of media contacts and charities and facts and statistics about the Jewish State.

One-One-One is an informal group of women planning what they can do to help Israel, Catzman said.

bilities. We can do much more damage to Palestinian society, but we don't, for domestic and international reasons."

Inbar warned that unilateral separation, a concept advocated by an increasing proportion of Israelis in the face of Palestinian suicide bombings, would be of little benefit.

"It's a slogan, like peace now. It reflects Israeli impatience and a desire for an easy solution."

He pointed out that the fortified fence Israel is building along the old Green Line may be of limited value. "Do you know that most of the suicide bombers come through regular Israeli checkpoints?"

At most, he said, the fence may reduce the frequency of the bombings.

Turning to a related topic, Inbar chided Egypt for permitting Palestinians to build tunnels into Gaza from the Sinai Peninsula. Israel has accused the Palestinians of using these tunnels to smuggle weapons.

Inbar said that if Saddam Hussein deploys chemical and biological against Israeli civilians, following an American attack on Iraq, Israel may well bomb Iraq's dams.

Responding to reports that Israel may retaliate with nuclear arms, Inbar said that Israel would only use them if its very existence is at stake.

A land-for-peace deal with Syria is not in the cards, Inbar said. "I don't see any reason, under any circumstances, for Israel to give back the Golan Heights. The price is too high. The status quo is good for Israel. There is quiet, and we have the Golan."

Inbar said that the Islamic movement in Israel is growing. "It has the potential to become a serious problem. We could see a real fifth column inside Israel.

"The majority of Israeli Arabs are law-abiding citizens, but they are torn between their sympathy for the Palestinians and their desire for prosperity. It's not clear what they'll decide."

Security to be tight when Netanyahu speaks at Concordia

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Concordia University is taking all security measures necessary to ensure that former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's public speech at its downtown campus on Sept. 9 will not turn into what one Jewish community official privately called a "circus."

The hawkish ex-Likud leader, who has been invited by the Hillel Jewish student association, will speak in the main auditorium of the downtown campus free of charge.

Concordia has been the site of high-profile pro-Palestinian activity over the past two years and there have been tensions between Arab and Jewish students.

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said the university suggested that Hillel hold the event in the hockey arena at the Loyola campus in Montreal's west end, but has accepted Hillel's refusal of that offer.

Hillel insisted on the downtown location because it is more accessible and will give the event more visibility.

Mota said the administration would have preferred that the event be held at Loyola because its arena seats 2,000, while the Hall building's room H-110 downtown accommodates about 630, after space is set aside for the media and dignitaries.

Mota acknowledged that security concerns were also a factor. "Absolutely it would be more secure," she said of the arena, because of the relative isolation and greater openness of the Loyola campus in Notre-Dame-de Grâce.

As for concerns that Concordia's image might suffer if it became the scene of another controversy related to the Middle East, Mota said "the bottom line is we are doing all we can to assist Hillel. We offered Loyola, but it is going ahead downtown, and all security measures required will be taken. Let's look forward to an interesting talk."

Both Concordia and Hillel expect Netanyahu to draw protesters. The question is how many and how aggressive they will be.

In November, 2000, Netanyahu's appearance at the University of California, Berkeley had to be cancelled when hundreds of rowdy protesters prevented some 2,000 ticket-holders from entering the theatre.

Netanyahu spoke privately in Montreal in May. His appearance was not publicized and the media were not allowed to attend.

Mota said the downtown auditorium venue "complicates" security arrangements because it is off the campus's main lobby, where traffic is expected to be especially heavy Sept. 9. That will be during Orientation Week when many other activities are scheduled.

"It's the first full week of classes. Thousands of students will be pouring through the lobby," she said.

Meetings have taken place between the university administration – including rector Frederick Lowy and dean of students Donald Boisvert – its head of security, the Concordia Student Union (CSU), and Hillel to discuss how to ensure the event goes smoothly.

The CSU has given its approval to Netanyahu's appearance. The CSU, which has in the past been accused of being anti-Israel, is now run by a new executive that was elected last spring.

Although he expects demonstrators during Netanyahu's appearance, Hillel executive director Simon Bensimon said he has no fear that the Berkeley debacle will be repeated in Montreal and does not think Hillel is needlessly throwing oil on the fire.

"An open university should encourage debate. It should be a free marketplace of ideas," he said.

He said Hillel decided to invite Netanyahu, who has been touted as a future contender for Israel's highest office, after it learned in early August that he would be in Montreal to speak to Jewish community leaders.

legacy of life - Harold Lederman 1932-2001

A new feature about extraordinary individuals who have left their mark on our community

Harold Lederman drew attention to himself whether he liked it or not. Yet it wasn't just his good looks or winning smile that had people talking. No, Mr. Lederman drew people close simply by being a genuinely nice guy with a generous heart.

"Harold was a very warm, bright and articulate person with a quick wit," says his son-in-law Allan Brown. "He had so many friends. And when you were his friend, you were his friend for life."

Still, being so terrific wasn't easy for someone as unassuming as Harold Lederman. Although he was a strong supporter of Jewish communal life, he ducked out of the limelight whenever he could. It was no easy feat staying anonymous as the leader of UJA Federation's Annual Campaign, chairman of Baycrest Centre Foundation, a major backer of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and UJA Federation's Vaughan Campus, and a Board Member of the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation.

Luckily, Harold's bubbly wife Shirley basked in the spotlight. The two were inseparable from the moment they met in the early 1950s, yet Shirley was the outspoken one who ran the show. Her husband treated her like gold. Says his brother-in-law Gerry Ross: "If Shirley was Miss America, Harold was Miss Congeniality."

Perhaps it was Harold's modest upbringing that molded him. Born in Toronto, he and sister Pauline were raised by parents Edward and Elsie in a small rented house on Grange Street in the heart of the Jewish community. He was a popular kid and a star basketball player at Harbord Collegiate Institute but "Harold and school weren't cut out to get along," says Ross. He tried his hand as a film booker but soon found success selling floor tiles. When his boss fired him for being too good at the job, the newly married Mr. Lederman persuaded a relative to lend him money and soon he was a partner in a small tile store.

"Harold was anxious to be successful," recalls his close friend and business partner Leo Goldhar. "We trusted each other with any decisions we made for the business and always backed each other up. He was extremely sincere and honest, and he'd never say no to anybody who needed help."

As the business flourished and grew into the highly successful Sterling Tile & Carpet, Harold began giving back to the community that gave him his start. He not only became actively involved in UJA and Baycrest, he was also a major philanthropist for a host of other Jewish and secular organizations.

"Harold was driven by a keen social conscience of what was right and what was wrong," says Ross. "Continuity was important to him. He taught his children to put away what they would need to live and give the rest to the community. When Harold passed away, his children Lisa and Richard continued giving."

Shirley and Harold died of cancer within three years of each other – Shirley in 1998 and Harold in 2001. But their legacy lives on. In April 2003, the Harold and Shirley Lederman Palliative Care Centre at The Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto is scheduled to open, offering patients diagnosed with advanced or terminal cancer a comforting setting for their end-of-life care. The Volunteer Lounge at Baycrest's new Apotex Centre bears their names. And UJA Federation has established The Harold Lederman Award for Philanthropic Leadership.

"Harold's message was to be responsible," says Ross. "He led by example, not by rhetoric. I miss his presence, his warmth and, above all, his leadership."

Explanation sought for damaged Israeli goods

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – What was supposed to have been a sorely needed opportunity to conduct business here turned into the loss of perhaps thousands of dollars in damages for one participant in the recent Israeli vendors fair.

Artisan Shimon Ben-Dor's silver Judaica art, shipped from Israel by UPS, arrived dented and broken apart in Montreal despite being securely packed.

Ben-Dor was one of 27 Israeli merchants who were at the Cavendish Mall for a recent two-day fair organized by members of the Jewish community.

The goal of the event was to help Israeli merchants whose business has suffered because of the lack of tourism in Israel and the general economic downturn as a result of terrorism.

Ben-Dor makes handmade sterling silver and gold ritual objects in Mitzpei Chagit, a small community in the northern Judean desert.

More than half of his merchandise failed to arrive in time for the fair's first day. When it arrived after noon on the second day, he was greatly relieved – until he opened the package.

Intact and sealed with tape, the large cardboard box encasing the goods appeared not to have been tampered with. But when Ben-Dor opened it, he discovered that the two metal carrying cases it contained were broken. The bottom of one was completely detached. Several of the objects the cases held were dented or broken apart. Nothing appeared to be missing.

Ben-Dor held up a lid with three distinct dents in it, something that would take considerable force to make in solid silver.

"These cases are especially designed to ship artwork," said Ben-Dor, who was clearly shocked. "They cost $300 (US) each."

He said he has shipped his work to numerous exhibitions around Israel and in different parts of the world.

"I don't know what to think," he said. The total value of the goods was around $5,000 (US), he said.

Ariela Cotler, a volunteer with the fair who hosted Ben-Dor at her home, said an investigation has been opened by UPS.

A UPS spokesperson last week confirmed that the investigation was underway but said, "It might be difficult to establish how or where it happened."

He acknowledged the curiosity of the fact that the exterior cardboard was untouched but that the casing and the goods inside were damaged.

Ben-Dor, back in Israel by the time the investigation was opened, was not available for comment.

The fair, which was modelled on similar events that have taken place in other North American cities since May, drew a large number of people, especially on its first day, a Sunday. Monday was quieter.

Nina Glick, who organized the event with husband Rabbi Mordechai Glick, said she didn't know how many people attended the event.

"Some estimate there were 10,000," she said. "Certainly, there was no parking space in the mall lot."

Volunteer Jerry Goffman described the first day as a "madhouse" because it was mobbed with so many people.

Buyers saw the fair as a chance to support the Israeli economy and to show their solidarity with ordinary Israelis who are having a hard time making a living.

The goods ranged widely. Among the most common items were Judaica giftware, ritual objects and jewelry. There were also T-shirts, prints, backpacks, cosmetics, herbal remedies and books.

The vendors fared differently. By Monday afternoon, just a few hours before the fair's close, there was still merchandise on most of the tables. Brian Bergner of Caesarea, who said his mezzuzot made of Jerusalem stone and jewelry of ancient glass sold fairly well, was thankful for the experience.

"It was a generous thing to do," he said. "From an emotional point of view, it helped me a lot."

The fair also received praise from Sandra Winston, the Montreal representative of the Israeli Economic Mission.

"This is a great initiative," Winston said. "It gives local people who cannot go to Israel the opportunity to feel they are supporting its economy. It allows them to feel good about contributing in their own way.

"I hope the merchants made enough revenue to make it worthwhile."

Consulate prepares to close

MONTREAL – Preparations for the closure of the Israeli consulate in Montreal were being made last week, but an official said the consulate will remain open until further notice.

Sandra Winston, Israeli trade commissioner in Montreal, said a representative of the Israeli Ministry of Finance from its New York office was at the consulate last week to take inventory and do paperwork in the event of a closure.

"We have been told that we can see clients for at least the first or second week of September," Winston said. "But we honestly don't know any more than that."

She said she had heard that talks are continuing behind-the-scenes between the Israeli government and leaders of the Montreal Jewish community, but the consulate staff is not privy to what is going on.

Whatever happens, Consul General Shlomo Avital will leave at the end of this month. He has been appointed ambassador to Senegal.

The Jewish community appears resigned to closure. Last Friday, the last of the weekly noon-hour, pro-Israel demonstrations in Dorchester Park across from the consulate was held.

קם ראש עיריית חיפה, שהוביל את העיר להישגים מרשימים בשלוש קדנציות, והחליט לרוץ לראשות הממשלה מטעם מפלגת העבודה. הוא מכונה "הנגרל האחרון של השמאל", אחרי קרירידה צבאית מרשימה, ועל פי הסקרים הוא לוקח את בן אליעזר בחליכה, אבל מפסיד בגדול לשרון. טוב, סך הכל שבועיים במירוץ.

אבל יש בעייה רצינית איתו: איש חרוץ ממוצא יֶקי שלא מסתחבק, לא שם צ'אפחות ולא מתחנף, איש ישר והגון שסיכוי לקבל מכונית שרד מהעיירייה, כדי שיוכל לנסע את המכונית לבנו בימי ששי.

נותעלד! איך יוכל איש כזה להישרד בפוליטיקה הישראלית? הרי יאכלו אותו חי תוך שבוע! אבל מה- שישאר בינינו. (מה יש , לא מגיע לַמדינה המשוגעת הזו מנהיג נורמאלי?).

הקיץ מתקופ לקיצו במהירות מבחילה. אז הינה כמה סרטים שאסור להחמיץ:

סרט שבדי נחדר שעניינו סיפור אהבה בין איכר פשוט ואישה יפה ומסתורית. גם חזק וגם רומנטי (Under the Sun). תשע בסולם קורן.

סרט ברימי על חוקר וחוקרת (גוטע פלטרו) ספרותיים שמשתפים פעולה כדי למצוא ראיות לרומן שהתנחל לפני מאה חמישים שנה בין שני משוררים מפורסמים, רומן שלא היה ידוע לחסטוריה הרשמית. היפה בסרט הם היחסים המקבילים שמתפתחים בין החוקרים לצד היחסים הרומנטיים לפני מאה חמישים שנה. (Possession). שמונה וחצי בסולם קורן.

A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Professor Martin Lockshin, Director, Centre for Jewish Studies

The name that Jews use today to refer to the holiday that will be observed this weekend, Rosh ha-shanah, The New Year, is a relatively recent name. Early Jewish texts often called it "the Day of Remembrance" (Yom ha-zikkaron).

At York University's Centre for Jewish Studies we are dedicated to Jewish memory. We are committed to enriching and making meaningful students' knowledge of Jewish history, language, literature and philosophy.

While many of the teaching and research activities of our Centre relate to the theme of "remembrance," I would like to highlight a project that we inaugurated last year that looks toward the past and toward the future as well. Our program "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future" trains future high school teachers both here and in Europe to teach the Holocaust in a meaningful way. The first group of these teachers completed their training this February with a week-long seminar and conference at York. We are confident that they will now be more effective teachers about the sad history of antisemitism in general and of the Holocaust in particular.

Our York students will also have the benefit of learning more on this topic this year as we welcome to York Dr. Keith Weiser, the first Silber Family Professor of Holocaust and Eastern European Jewish Studies. This Chair is the first of its kind in Canada, focusing on remembering both the Holocaust and the vibrant Jewish life in Eastern Europe before the Shoah.

5762 was a difficult year for Jews in many countries. We at York believe that bringing knowledge of the Jewish past to both Jews and non-Jews can strengthen the Jewish future. We ask for the community's continuing support for our efforts.

On behalf of my colleagues and myself I would like to wish you all the best for 5763. Leshanah tovah tikkatevu!

JCC-Maccabi Games hailed as Montreal triumph

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The 1,500 Jewish teens aged 13 to 16 who straggled home giddy and exhausted last Friday from the JCC Maccabi Games Aug. 18 to 23 would surely have agreed the games were a hit even before the first running shoe was laced on Day 1.

That's because the tone for the 20th anniversary games was set at the opening ceremonies at the Molson Centre, with thousands in attendance, a glitzy "parade of nations," and appearances by notables including Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay and hockey legend Jean Béliveau.

The event also included American swimmer Lenny Krazelberg, a Maccabi movement veteran who won three gold medals at the Sydney Olympics two years ago.

Steven Levy, head of the British delegation, said he had been to several previous JCC-Maccabi Games, but Montreal was the best.

"The opening ceremonies were incredible," he said. "We had a fantastic time."

Montrealer Jacqueline Hopmeyer, 16, who competed in basketball, echoed that sentiment. From the beginning, the games, she proclaimed, were "very cool."

When it was all over five days later, the champions turned out to be not only the medal winners (who numbered in the hundreds), but the 650 host families, 1,000-plus volunteers, and numerous Y staffers – especially games director Néhal Nassif – who pulled it all off with only the occasional turned ankle to put a wrinkle in an otherwise seamless operation.

"We were here to see that the athletes were happy and had everything to eat," said volunteer Hy Boronsky, 75.

Montreal was one of five sites across North America hosting the games in recent weeks (the others were Baltimore, Memphis, Omaha and Springfield, Mass). The Montreal Y was hosting them for the first time.

Other Canadian cities represented at the games were Toronto (about 90 kids), Windsor (10), Winnipeg (14), and Vancouver (about 50). Israel brought a 12-member delegation.

As things got started, organizers lifted the media blackout that had been promised for the duration of the games. In the months leading up to the games, organizers felt that tight security was necessary. The day competition began, the story was on page 3 of the Gazette.

The seven nations that took part – Canada, the United States, Great Britain, Israel, Mexico, Venezuela, and Australia – earned medal after medal. According to the games' Web site, www.montrealmaccabi.com, the United States garnered 178 medals to Canada's 112. Way back were Australia (10), Mexico (5), and Venezuela (1).

Games also about forming bonds bronze medal over the favoured U.S. team. Toronto girls scored a big silver medal in basketball.

Canada seemed to dominate in golf, the United States in basketball, while the golds, silvers and bronzes went both ways in tennis and bowling. Table tennis honours were shared by Canada, the United States and Australia.

Canada was also pleased to receive silvers in boys baseball (despite U.S. dominance) and girls softball, and bronzes in boys basketball, boys inline hockey, and boys and girls soccer (complete results – except for swimming – were available at writing on the games' Web site).

But as teens from Miami to Mexico, and organizers themselves, said in interviews, the games were not really about medals, but about forming social and community bonds to be nurtured their whole lives.

Mix the host family barbecues, parties, evenings at Jillians and the Palace with the natural tendency of teens to socialize, organizers said, and you had the recipe for the incredible high spirits that prevailed throughout the games.

"I remember on the third or fourth day, we were talking about a certain activity that was being planned, and someone said: 'By the way, does anyone know how the sports are going?'" joked Linda Kislowicz, the Y's executive director.

Part of the Canadian team.

Roy Salomon, the games' honorary chair (the official chair was Martin Schwartz), said that while participants acquitted themselves well in the competition (many JCC-Maccabi veterans have gone on to compete at the Maccabiah Games in Israel), the spirit of camaraderie that prevailed was special.

"You have to remember," Salomon said, "that some of the athletes who participated come from communities where the level of Jewish identification or community involvement is not as great as in Montreal.

"It was a revelation for them to see that. Making homemade kippahs, a great Israeli presence, a place for hang time – this is all part of the future of building Jewish leadership.

"Two girls from Edmonton who were there could not believe that everyone at the Molson Centre was Jewish."

Israeli Ofir Naim, who competed in basketball here as well as at the JCC games this year in Baltimore and Memphis, said that while his team won no medals – "We're not that good" – he enjoyed every minute in Montreal.

The best part of the games, he and everyone The CJN spoke to said, was "meeting people."

They also were impressed by the Day of Caring/Day of Sharing midway through the games, in which the kids spent a few hours doing community volunteer work to reinforce its importance in the Jewish ethos.

Kislowicz summed it all up: "We really have to congratulate the community for the warmth and spirit with which it embraced [the kids]," she said.

"Our Montreal community really came forward."

How many licks will Israel take from the CBC?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Since returning to Israel in August, Neil Macdonald, the Mideast correspondent for CBC TV News, appears to be on an intensified mission: as of Aug. 27, CBC had aired five of his reports, all wholly negative toward Israel.

In his Aug. 20 report, he gave what can only mildly be described as a disapproving slant on Israel's withdrawal from Bethlehem and parts of Gaza, a story that most other journalists portrayed as a small but promising development in reducing Israeli-Palestinian tensions.

Macdonald paints the withdrawal as a Palestinian "sellout" to Israel. Of course, he does not say this himself. Rather, he cites various Palestinian officials, adding: "That is certainly the view of every single militant group here including armed factions of [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat's own political party."

By failing to provide any counter to the "sellout" charge, however, Macdonald gives it credence. Moreover, he fails to add any information that gives a wider context for the charge: that Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza is, in any event, not enough for those "militants" (Macdonald continues to shun the term "terrorists") who want to destroy Israel.

Macdonald's report is visually set up to contrast the comforts of "Jewish west Jerusalem" and the hardships of Ramallah, where Macdonald physically positions himself amid the rubble.

This, of course, creates visual sympathy for the Palestinians and thus can very easily also persuade the viewer to accept the "militants'" dedication to what one Palestinian official in the report calls "resistance against the Israeli occupation."

In reviewing all of Macdonald's recent stories, and in the absence of any countervailing view in his Aug. 20 report, one cannot be faulted for assuming that Macdonald is taking sides, expressing his own personal attitudes through the words of others. Indeed, Macdonald's reports have sounded so one-sided that CBC's commitment to fairness and balance appears to lie in tatters.

CBC management has all along maintained that Macdonald's reports, like all CBC news reports, achieve balance over time. But that assertion appears to be nothing more than a fiction, especially when compared with Adrienne Arsenault's studiously even-handed reporting from Israel earlier this summer. The contrast with Macdonald upon his return could not be starker and more jarring.

In its own Journalistic Standards and Practices guidebook, the CBC insists that "[o]ptimum objectivity and balance... must characterize CBC information programs" (emphasis added). Under the heading of fairness, the CBC requires that a report must reflect "equitably the relevant facts and significant points of view." Under credibility, the guidebook also states: "In order to maintain their own credibility and that of the CBC, on-air personnel... must avoid publicly identifying themselves in any way with partisan statements or actions on controversial matters" (emphasis added).

Macdonald's depiction of Israelis as faceless oppressors and the Palestinians as innocent victims found a new expression in the concluding line of the Aug. 20 report. In it, Macdonald describes an incident in which undercover Israeli soldiers killed a wanted Palestinian in Ramallah. The man is referred to as "quarry," thereby depicting the Israelis, in effect, as bloodthirsty hunters.

Is Macdonald determined to get in as many licks at Israel as he can before his stint in the Middle East draws to a close? Does the CBC intend to continue to let him get away with it?

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am the mother of a child with a severe peanut allergy. Although most schools and camps are nut-aware now, I am continually amazed at how unaware parents of non-allergic kids are as to what they can and can't send to school. Can you help explain what is involved?

A. I am thrilled to take this opportunity to help educate parents. This is such an important topic and there is frighteningly little information about it disseminated to parents.

My first suggestion to parents of allergic kids and to schools (and other institutions) is that instead of only telling parents what they can't send or do, tell them what they can send or do. Put together a list of nut-free snacks and outline hand- and face-washing procedures for children prior to coming to school. Parents of non-allergic kids will likely be far more compliant if they can shóp with a list of safe snacks in hand, instead of having to spend hours in a grocery store trying to decipher labels and ingredients.

To parents of non-allergic kids: please don't be lazy at the possible expense of a child's life. I am infuriated when I hear a parent tell me, that he or she sent Nutella to school because "I was tired and in a rush and had nothing else in the house." If that's the case, please send bread and butter instead.

Remember, that "nuts" does not only mean peanuts. Foods with nuts include breads with sunflower seeds, walnuts, etc., as well as granola bars with almonds, chocolate bars with nuts or peanut butter, chips fried in peanut oil, pistachios and all foods labelled "may contain traces of nuts," not to mention many others that are not labelled this way. You must read labels for nut ingredients, as companies are not legally required to note that a product may contain traces of nuts.

Ask your child's school or camp to provide you with a list of safe snacks to make life safer and easier for everyone.

B'nai Brith wants authors of 'anti-Semitic' Web site penalized

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Concordia University was consulting its lawyers last week after B'nai Brith Canada complained that the Web site of a Muslim student group hosted by the university's server was linked to "virulent anti-Semitic materials."

In a letter to rector Frederick Lowy, Amos Sochaczevski, national chair of B'nai Brith's Institute for International Affairs, and Yoni Petel, Quebec youth chair, refer to the site of the Students Association for Muslim Awareness (SAMA).

In the letter, B'nai Brith "requests that the university shut down the SAMA Web site immediately, and conduct a thorough investigation of SAMA's adherence to Concordia's anti-hate and Internet use policies, as well as the university's code of conduct for student groups."

The fate of the Web site was in question by the middle of last week, apparently as a result of a story on B'nai Brith's objection that appeared in the National Post. The SAMA site said "Under construction/Check back later."

Two days earlier, the address of the SAMA site's link to material denying the Holocaust and to Henry Ford's 1922 anti-Semitic treatise The International Jew was changed to a non-existent address. Another link to a pro-Hezbollah site with a defence of suicide bombings against Israeli civilians was also changed.

The changed links and the "Under construction" message do not alter B'nai Brith's demand that SAMA be "sanctioned" for having disseminated material that "incites hatred and condones violence," research director Raphael Lallouz said.

"Strong action has to be taken by the administration, either through the law or the university internal disciplinary system," he said. "We also wonder if the CSU will continue to provide funding to [SAMA]. Is students hard-earned money going to finance an organization that advocates hate and violence?"

The site was hosted at Concordia's main site, http://alcor.concordia.ca/ ~sama.

It could also be accessed through the Concordia Student Union site, which lists all registered student groups.

SAMA did not return a phone call from The CJN.

When its site was up, SAMA described itself as "a religious and political association dedicated to bring [sic] awareness to the student body of Concordia about the religion of Islam and the political, social and economic situation around the world."

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said the university's "lawyer and external counsel are investigating… There seems to be some confusion over whether the [SAMA] site is hosted on our site."

The SAMA site's "library" section reproduced Ford's classically anti-Semitic work, subtitled The World's Foremost Problem, which accuses Jews of conspiring to gain power and influence.

Another link under the heading "Islamic Resistance" originally led to www.moqawama.tv, the site of the pro-Hezbollah Islamic Resistance Support Association. After B'nai Brith's complaint, the link was apparently changed to the non-existent www.moqawama. org.

In its Articles & Opinions section, the SAMA site also contained a link to a lengthy unattributed piece entitled "Questions on the Holocaust (A German Point of View)."

In a question-and-answer format, it denies there is proof that the Nazis practiced genocide and says the figure of six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust is "an exaggeration of possibly 1,000 per cent."

It also describes the present-day Auschwitz site as "a fake, pure and simple, a flimsy tourist trap," and says no gas chambers or crematoria were used for killing in the concentration camps.

The article alleges that 300,000 Jews died in the camps, mostly from typhus.

It accuses Jews of using the Holocaust "story" to "shield them from any criticism over their political, economic and social behavior" and to raise "guilt money" from Germany and other international sources.

"This is a blatant treatise of Holocaust denial, which stands out amongst a menu of egregious and inflammatory accusations against Israel," wrote Sochaczevski and Petel.

Lallouz later commented that changing the link addresses was "playing foolish tactics, rather than acknowledging a mistake or apologizing to the Jewish community. You really wonder what kind of people are behind that."

Lallouz said he knew nothing about SAMA and had no contact with it.

B'nai Brith also objected to a third SAMA link to www.bayynat.org, apparently an information site on Islam. Under its Muslim Scholars section, there is a link to an interview with Sayyed Mohammed Hussein Fadlullah, whom B'nai Brith describes as a Muslim religious authority based in Lebanon with ties to Hezbollah.

Fadlullah argues that "there is no difference" between the soldier who uses conventional methods and the Palestinian "martyrs" because both are trying to achieve what they believe in, even if the targets are civilians. He criticizes those who oppose suicide operations as being in violation of Islamic law.

A fictitious account of medieval Jewish philosopher

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

British author Iain Pears has created a literary character named Gersonides, based on the actual medieval French Jewish philosopher of the same name, known to Talmudists as Levi ben Gershom or by the acronym Ralbag.

The character appears in Pears's new novel, The Dream of Scipio (Knopf Canada, $37.95), itself a complex intellectualized study of Provence in three different historical periods – the time of the collapse of the Roman Empire in the 5th century, the Black Death in the 14th century when Gersonides lived, and the relatively modern Holocaust era. The narrative intertwines the fortunes of three men, one from each era.

Books

"The book is about certain ideas, including anti-Semitism, and how they are transmitted over the centuries," explained Pears during a recent interview.

Gersonides is an associate of one of the book's central characters, a medieval Christian poet named Olivier de Noyen who consults with him on a philosophical matter. This is apparently much in keeping with real life, since little is known of the Ralbag's life, the Encyclopedia Judaica relates, "beyond the fact that he maintained relations with important Christian persons."

Since our only knowledge of Gersonides is derived from the many works he wrote on mathematics, astronomy, biblical, philosophical and other subjects, Pears acknowledged that he used full artistic license in inventing a character for him.

"He was this immensely erudite and impressive figure. I found him appealing because he was written out of history," he said. "One thing is clear, we have absolutely no evidence at all about his personal life. Everything we know about him comes from his output. So I had to give him a character that seemed to match his output."

Although the presence of an oft-cited Talmudic sage in a novel may intrigue those who have encountered his writings or reputation in other contexts, Pears explained his novel in a much wider context.

"It's all about the centrality of the Jews to the whole of Western civilization – positively and negatively," he said. "Western civilization is defined by its relation to the Jews and would be something very different if the Jews weren't there."

He said he conceived of the book as a means of explaining "how the French people of the 1940s could have done what they did" to the Jews during the Second World War.

The book's main character is Julien Barneuve, a supposedly "civilized" intellectual who joined the Vichy government as minister of education, in which capacity he "introduced some anti-Semitic legislation that chucked all the Jews out of their jobs."

"This was not a man who was not obviously anti-Semitic – he was a good man – so the whole book is an investigation of how someone like that could have done what he did and why."

Pears is the author of seven earlier works, mostly highly-praised detective novels like An Instance of the Fingerpost. He is also the author of a book of art history and many articles on artistic, financial and historical subjects.

But The Dream of Scipio "took me by surprise. It was supposed to be just a story when I started writing it. I didn't realize it was going to come out like this." As Jews are fundamental to the story, the 47-year-old Oxford-educated author explained that he became intrigued with the subject because his wife and family are Jewish.

As for Gersonides, Pears said he grew to like him while writing the book. "He'll come across for what he was, a man of immense wisdom. I have no way of telling if my interpretation of his character is correct. I became rather fond of him. I gave him a rather likeable character, if a somewhat cranky one. Whether he would like that or not, I don't know."

Genealogical quest sends author on an odyssey

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Books

Ten years ago, American historian Emily Rose became curious about a pair of fine oil portraits that had hung above the fireplace in her grandparents' apartment in New York.

One of the paintings showed a portly, distinguished man, the other a woman adorned in a lace bonnet and pearls. Since they derived from the mid-1800s, their elderly subjects had likely been born in the 1700s. But no one in Rose's family could identify them.

A few old family papers gave some details from an old 19th-century German-Jewish register: Berlizheimer, Gundelfinger and other surnames jumped out, also Muhringen and other town names. Rose knew of her Berlizheimer ancestors, but little more of her family's past in rural Germany.

Stationed in Frankfurt in 1994 while her husband was learning German, she drove several hours south to Muhringen, and found some ancestral stones in local cemeteries and many family-related documents in local archives. Three weeks of research and many villages later, she had begun an odyssey that would result in a book – Portraits Of Our Past: Jews of the German Countryside – that was published by the Jewish Publication Society in 2001.

Because it was sparked by a personal genealogical quest, the reader might expect this endeavour to focus rather narrowly on the experiences of a given family line. But the author offers a surprisingly thorough and scholarly discussion of the many historical forces and events that affected the Jews in rural Germany from the period of the Enlightenment to about the mid-19th-century.

The narrative then crosses the Atlantic, following the early wave of German-Jewish settlers to America and presenting some of their experiences in the new land. Portraits Of Our Past, therefore, is an intriguing blend of personal genealogy and historical scholarship. Trained as a historian, the Naples, Fla.-based author possesses the double blessing of an impressive command of her subject and a clear writing style.

Jews of the German countryside lived substantially different lives than their counterparts in cities like Frankfurt and Berlin, Rose observes, contending that not much has ever been written on them in English.

To learn more about these rural Jews, she visited many town archives and the Wurttemberg State Archive in Stuttgart, where she found that her Berlizheimer ancestor was a signatory to an early emancipation petition. She also read the stories of 19th-century writer Berthold Auerbach and pored over an invaluable cache of old papers that had been retrieved from the attic genizah of the Michelbach synagogue.

Rottweil, one of the towns that comes under the author's microscope, was caught in a severe crisis when the French army, under the command of Napoleon Bonaporte, marched through in 1799, demanding cash rather than grain and goods from the local government.

The town turned in desperation to Rose's ancestor, the wealthy Jew Moises Kaz of Muhringen, who paid fair market rates for all the valuables of the town's churches and guilds.

"Thus, Moises saved Rottweil by acting quickly and by taking the risk that he might actually be unable to sell the silver and gold in those difficult and dangerous wartime years," Rose writes. "The town never forgot his efforts."

The book, which was also published in German as When Moises Kaz Saved His Town from Napoleon, is filled with many such stories. Rose spent months in archives and photocopied thousands of documents in hard-to-read German gothic script, many pertaining to her own family; managing, ultimately, to reconstruct a vivid picture of a vanished milieu.

(The feat seems instantly comparable to that of Montreal historian Gershon Hundert, whose book The Jews in a Private Polish Town: The Case of Opatow in the Eighteenth Century, appeared in 1992.)

One story that was discovered too late for inclusion in Rose's book concerns the fate of one of her 19th-century cousins who became a legendary success in America. Settling initially in Providence. R.I., Maximilian D. Berlizheimer (1852-1921) shortened his name to Berlitz and founded the famed world-wide chain of language schools.

Incredibly, no one had previously recognized that he had been Jewish. Although Rose has presented solid evidence to Berlitz International, the company has yet to alter its official corporate history or even accept that its founder was Jewish, she says.

Chess player Kaufman named to Canadian under-10 team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Harris Kaufman possesses a unique set of talents not often found among today's nine-year-old kids. Unlike many youngsters who are easily distracted and need constant sensory stimuli, young Harris has the special ability to focus his attention, concentrate on the task at hand and plan his moves far in advance.

Handy skills indeed if you're a champion chess player – which Harris certainly is. Though like most kids, Harris would rather be playing his favourite game – "hockey, hockey, hockey" – it's at chess that he's really excelled, becoming one of Canada's best young players.

Harris was recently named to the Canadian chess team that in November will travel to Heraklio, Crete for the 11-day World Junior Chess Championships. He made the team following the National Championships, a qualification tournament held in Montreal. Harris is one of three players in his age group to be named to the team, not surprising given that the Chess Federation of Canada has rated Harris second in the nation for kids under 10.

Harris Kaufman

Though it may not be hockey, Harris enjoys a good game of chess, especially the part about competing and winning.

When last we checked in on young Harris three years ago, the precocious lad had just won a national tournament and was the country's top-ranked player among kids in Grade 1.

Of course, in those days, an interview with The CJN ended quickly, as milk and cookies beckoned him and a friend.

Since then, Harris continued his rise up the chess ladder, racking up victories and improving his national ranking. What's more, he's gradually built up a nest egg of earnings that has already exceeded that of kids much older than he.

Harris' mom, Vicki Sterling, said Harris sometimes comes home with $100 in prize money following a weekend tournament, far in excess of the $9 per month allowance she and her husband Allan have set aside for him. Harris would love to spend the money on an expensive computer game, but she and Allan are worried that would distract him from concentrating on chess.

When it comes to chess, Harris combines natural talent with plenty of hard work. Besides the fact his paternal great-grandfather, Harry Silverberg, was a very good player in Winnipeg, and his maternal grandfather, Irving Sterling still enjoys a good match, Harris practices and plays a lot. He's coached by Youri Ochkos and has trained at the Chess 'n Math club on Bayview, near Eglinton.

Prior to the Montreal tournament, Harris was one of 30 youngsters who challenged international grand master Igor Ivanov to simultaneous games. Harris was one of only two or three kids to beat him.

For Harris, "that was probably the best game I played in my life."

The win, coming just before the start of the tournament, "helped me be very confident," he said.

It showed. Harris began the competition by defeating his first opponent in 15 minutes and the second in nine moves.

Day two proved more difficult as the competition became "fierce," Sterling said. Harris lost his next two games, putting him in the unenviable position of needing to win the remaining four matches to qualify for the national team. That's nearly impossible, Harris later said.

Considering two of his last four games were against top Canadian players, Harris was probably right to worry. Still, employing the Sicilian Defence, Harris defeated Kevin Me, the number one ranked player in his age group, and followed that up with a victory over one of Ontario's top players.

In the end, he fought his way on to the national team.

Following the Montreal tournament, Harris' Canadian Chess Federation (CCF) rating improved to 1597. Canada's top player under 10 is Shiyam Thavandiran, who has a rating of 1991.

Israel pushes projects, Palestinians play politics

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG – Israel was hoping its practical experience in dealing with environmental issues would prove attractive to other nations at the UN World Summit for Sustainable Development, according to Israel's environment minister.

While Israel is "only a tiny speck on the planet" and its contribution to solving environmental problems is limited by its size and resources, it can offer valuable knowledge and expertise to many of the 170 countries at the summit, Tzachi Hanegbi said in an interview last Thursday.

"We can contribute our successful experience in many areas, relating to solar heating, making run-off water fit for agriculture and irrigation and our technology that enables us to get it up to the standard of drinking water and the struggle against desertification and many more," areas, he said. "Our work on desertification is not theoretical, but was done in the most empirical laboratory of all in the Negev and the Arava."

Hanegbi was one of the two Israeli cabinet ministers who attended the summit, which ran Aug. 26 to Sept. 4. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was also due to arrive last weekend.

Several meetings were scheduled with South African officials, Hanegbi said, and Israel wanted to use them to propose a number of co-operative projects.

An "infinite number" of joint projects could be carried out with the Palestinian Authority (PA) that would benefit both sides, Hanegbi said.

"Our prime minister is aware of our attempts to promote a professional dialogue with the Palestinians," he said.

Hanegbi said he had asked a senior UN official at the summit to try to arrange a meeting in Johannesburg with Hanegbi's PA counterpart to renew a dialogue on environmental issues. So far, he said, he had had no success.

"It's very sad," Hanegbi said. "Up to the year 2000," when the intifadah began, "we had ongoing contacts with the Palestinians, even though there were hardly any practical results."

In the last two years, professional dialogue has "gone underground" because the Palestinians refuse to meet with their Israeli counterparts, Hanegbi said.

Several issues affecting both sides could be tackled jointly, such as pollution caused by run-off water and joint purification plants to treat it, or the mosquito-borne West Nile disease.

"We have a lot to offer them on how to combat" West Nile disease, Hanegbi said. "Of course, if they don't do so in their areas, the mosquitoes don't stop at the army checkpoints."

By contrast, joint projects still are being carried out with Jordan, he said.

Last Sunday, Jordan and Israel were to present a plan at the summit for a canal between the Red Sea and Dead Sea to keep the Dead Sea from drying up. Jordan's water ministry and Israel's environment ministry are co-operating on the project.

According to Jordanian experts, the level of the Dead Sea has fallen by some 60 feet in the last 40 years. If not addressed, the size of the sea will shrink by a third in the next decade, they say.

Under the plan, a canal would channel water from the Gulf of Eilat toward the Dead Sea and would be desalinized. The desalinized water would be used by population centres in Jordan, while the leftover salty water would be channeled into the Dead Sea, raising its water level.

However, such plans have been proposed in the past and have never gotten off the ground.

According to Hanegbi, Israel must emphasize the importance of regional co-operation with its neighbours "in a common struggle against the many problems that affect Jews and Arabs equally."

"The air we breathe does not distinguish between Palestinians and Jews, nor does the water we drink," he said.

Regarding Palestinian efforts to exploit the conference to attack Israel, Hanegbi said Israel had not, as of last Thursday, been forced to make a serious effort to defend itself this year, as it did at last year's UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban.

"All in all, I think there is sympathy for Israel here. The Israeli teams are received enthusiastically and they have spoken in the plenum without interruption," he said. "We feel the latest Palestinian attempts to create a confrontational profile against a Middle East background has actually failed."

But this could still change, Hanegbi cautioned late last week.

Palestinians and their supporters had scheduled a major march and rally for Saturday, when the Israeli delegation can not respond because of Shabbat.

The Palestine Solidarity Committee of South Africa, which has been co-ordinating anti-Israel activities at the conference, said it had received a commitment from several South African government ministers to attend the rally, which it said is intended to "inspire new victories in the fight against USA-Israeli terrorism."

Hanegbi met last Thursday with South Africa's deputy foreign minister, Aziz Pahad, and told him that if South African ministers march against Israel, it would "explode the conference and shift its focus to Middle Eastern politics," according to the Post.

Palestinian activists tried to provoke Israelis every day since the summit began. Until last Thursday, most of the disturbances had taken place at the forum of nongovernmental organizations or in street protests, not at the summit's official proceedings.

On Thursday, however, the director-general of Israel's Regional Co-operation Ministry was interrupted as he spoke to the main plenum about regional development.

The PA representative stood up and asked Majallie Wahabee, who is Druze, how Israel could speak about development when the Israeli army is killing Palestinians. The Palestinian invited Wahabee to come to the Gaza Strip to "see the destruction."

Mordechai Yedid, deputy director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, responded from the plenum by calling for renewed Israeli-Palestinian dialogue.

"Israel co-operates with its Arab neighbours in several regional development programs and we look forward to deepening the regional co-operation process, but unfortunately the situation with the PA has been less encouraging because terrorism causes serious obstacles to the promotion of sustainable development," Yedid said.

He also called on the Palestinians to return to the "path of dialogue."

The Palestinian responded by saying that Israel's dialogue is the "dialogue of destruction."

Olmert: Gov't must prevent collapse of southern wall on Temple Mount

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert called last week on the government to take immediate action to prevent a potential "historical and human disaster" should the southern part of the Western Wall collapse.

The area of the wall in question has gradually moved outward from its original position. Some people have claimed the shift is the result of illegal construction on the Temple Mount by the Waqf, the Muslim religious trust.

"In my opinion, we have reached the moment of truth," Olmert told Israel Radio. "The government of Israel has no alternative but to decide to exercise our natural authority with regard to the Temple Mount.

"We made all kinds of efforts to reach understandings [on the issue] – which I cannot fully reveal here because of their sensitive nature both here in Israel and abroad - to pinpoint the reasons [for the movement of the Wall], so we can properly address the matter," said Olmert.

Early last week, a citizens' watchdog group sent an urgent letter to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon warning of "a clear and present danger that the southern part of the Western Wall and the Temple Mount might collapse" as a result of the Waqf's construction. In the letter, the Committee for the Prevention of the Destruction of Antiquities urged Sharon "to take immediate action to deal with the problem before a disaster occurs."

"To date, no steps have been taken in the matter, which means that nothing can be done to correct the situation," said archaeologist Eilat Mazar, a member of the group. The question now is "whether the Wall will collapse on thousands of worshippers or if it will happen in a controlled manner."

Two weeks ago, the Foreign Ministry, intervening on behalf of a delegation of Jordanian engineers, returned to the group special drilling equipment that had been confiscated by border authorities.

The Jordanians had intended to use the equipment, under the supervision of the Waqf, in the area of the southern wall of the Temple Mount. Israel has suggested that renewed Jordanian involvement on the Temple Mount stems from the Waqf's refusal to allow the Antiquities Authority to examine and treat the extensive bulge that formed in the southern wall of the Temple Mount compound over the past few years.

Following a series of contacts made before last week's incident – including a conversation between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Jordan's King Abdullah and a cable from the Prime Minister's Office to Egypt – the Waqf agreed to allow the Jordanians to investigate the problem. Israel, for its part, agreed to allow the drill findings to be examined in a laboratory in Amman.

But something went awry. The Jordanians returned to Amman without carrying out the drilling operations. Israel said the Waqf, which is strongly influenced by the Palestinian Authority, did not hold up its side of the agreement. The Waqf said there was no agreement and that only the Muslim religious authorities are in charge of the Mount.

The bulge in the wall is not a new development. The Committee for the Prevention of the Destruction of Antiquities links the problem to work carried out in recent years in the area of Solomon's Stables, located undergroud at the Mount's Southern Gates.

Jerusalem District archaeologist Gon Zeligman, however, said he does not believe the work near the stables is connected to the current problem.

Adnan Husseini, the director-general of the Waqf, agreed, saying that since the mid-1970s he has been aware of the problem. Antiquities Authority Director-General Shuka Dorfman said that the bulge appears in photographs as far back as the early part of the 20th century.

The amount of the wall's swelling over the past year is also under debate. Zeligman said that based on measurements made by the authority's engineers, the bulge along the exterior of the southern wall grew by 1.5 centimetres over the past year. Eilat said the depth of the bulge doubled from some 70 centimetres a year ago, to around 1.5 metres today.

Conference On Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Inc.
Claims Conference website: www.claimscon.org

Holocaust Compensation

In recent negotiations, the German government agreed to pay survivors of certain camps it had previously determined were not eligible for the Claims Conference Article 2 Fund.

Jewish Holocaust survivors of certain concentration camps and forced-labor battalions in Libya, Romania, (under restricted criteria) Czech Republic, Slovakia, the former Yugoslavia, Somovit in Bulgaria, and Ferramonti di Tarsia in Italy during a specific time period who were incarcerated for at least 6 months may now be eligible for monthly pensions from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference).

Survivors currently receiving pensions from the German Government (under the BEG) are not eligible. Applicants who at the time of persecution were citizens of certain Western European countries may also not be eligible. Current income will also determine eligibility.

If an application has already been submitted for the Article 2 Fund, it is not necessary to re-apply.

British Chief Rabbi Sacks: The Guardian misrepresented views

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

LONDON — British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks says his views on Israel were badly misrepresented in an interview published in the British newspaper The Guardian last week.

In the interview, Rabbi Sacks said the conflict with the Palestinians "is forcing Israel into postures that are incompatible in the long run with [Judaism's] deepest ideals" and "generates hatreds and insensitivities that in the long run are corrupting to a culture."

The comments created a storm both in Israel and in Britain, and right-wing groups in Britain even demanded that Rabbi Sacks resign.

In a letter to Israeli Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, Rabbi Sacks said the "sensationalist headlines" the paper gave the interview, which emphasized these statements, did not match the message he was trying to convey.

Rabbi Sacks also protested that the statements were "used to portray me as a critic of Israel."

"For the past two years, I have consistently supported Israel and made its case in the British media, with all the love I feel and all the power I have," he wrote to Rabbi Lau.

"To make Israel's case effectively, I have spoken not only to the media who support Israel, but also to Israel's critics. As anyone who has read The Guardian interview in full will see, it contains a strong defence of Israel, the strongest that this paper has printed."

Rabbi Sacks ended the letter by pledging to continue defending Israel before every possible audience.

Protesters disrupt Israeli ecology presentation

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — A little bit of Durban has come to Johannesburg.

Mirroring the efforts of anti-Israel demonstrators who tried to prevent Jewish groups from participating in sessions of last year's UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, pro-Palestinian demonstrators last week disrupted an ecological workshop given by Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael-Jewish National Fund (JNF) at the World Summit for Sustainable Development.

Despite the pro-Palestinian interruptions – the fracas at the JNF workshop was one of several that took place from the time the conference opened last Monday – Palestinian activists were unable to take over the summit, as they did last year at the anti-racism conference.

The workshop highlighted the JNF's professional expertise in areas relevant to the environmental summit, as well as ways the organization could help other countries.

More than 150 people crowded the workshop premises, designed to hold no more than about 80. About one-third were pro-Palestinian delegates to the non-governmental portion of the summit.

As the workshop started, Uri Davis, a pro-Palestinian Israeli activist who wrote the book Israel: An Apartheid State, tried to interrupt the proceedings by raising a procedural point. Davis was brought to South Africa by anti-Israel elements for both last year's Durban conference and this year's summit.

The workshop chair would not allow Davis to proceed.

Yehiel Leket, world chair of the JNF, said the purpose of the workshop was to have JNF experts present Israeli experiences with sustainable development.

"Our line here is that we are not involved in politics and do not want to get drawn into politics," Leket said. "We have much to share on sustainable development. So far we have managed to keep it that way. Coming here only as a professional body has borne fruit."

There has been significant interest in what JNF has to offer, both from governmental representatives – the United States, Germany and even Oman – and from NGOs, Leket said.

Members of the JNF technical team spoke on the use of scarce water resources, rehabilitation of degraded areas in the Negev, sustainable biodiversity and ecological forest renewal.

Team member Paul Ginsberg was using a 1930s photograph to illustrate the need for creating new forests when a demonstrator came to the front of the room and shouted that the picture had been taken in the West Bank in what was then Mandatory Palestine.

When security officials removed the protester, Palestinian supporters began chanting "Free, free, Palestine," and "Free, free, West Bank."

The Jewish Agency for Israel said the demonstrators were led by the lawyer for Marwan Barghouti, a Palestinian militia leader jailed in Israel awaiting trial on terrorism charges.

Minor scuffles ensued as police removed the demonstrators, allowing the presentation to continue after a 30-minute delay.

During the presentation, demonstrators distributed anti-JNF propaganda. One document, issued by the Movement Against Israeli Apartheid In Palestine, alleged that over 700,000 trees were uprooted in one year in "Israeli-occupied Palestine" and demanded that the conference disqualify the JNF, which it called "the mainstay of Israeli apartheid."

A second document, called Factsheet Jewish National Fund and issued by LAW – The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, accused JNF of helping to carry out the Jewish state's "undeclared aim of getting rid of Israel's indigenous population."

JNF executive member Zvi Lidar said JNF expertise could be useful to many countries, particularly in Africa.

"We are committed to remaining focused on the critical issues of sustainable development," he said. "But the Palestinians are coming here and polluting this conference."

Israeli arms were bound for Iran, Germany alleges

By BARUCH KRA
and AVI SHMOULI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As an impounded cargo ship said to be carrying rubber gaskets for armoured personnel carrier (APC) treads began making its way back to Israel from Hamburg, the Defence Ministry handed over documents to the police to investigate whether the containers were being sold to Iran by a private Israeli company.

Hamburg customs inspectors discovered the two containers holding the rubber gaskets in mid-August on the Zim Antwerp I, when it docked in the German port. The cargo was to be transferred from one freighter to another for transport to Iran, German customs authorities said in a statement.

German arms export laws forbid the sale of military equipment to Iran, so the German Economics Ministry blocked the transport, the statement said, adding the load was to be shipped back to Israel.

Iran denied involvement, and German officials refused to give further details, but Israeli officials said they and Germany were conducting a joint investigation.

"We are treating this issue very seriously," Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told reporters in Jerusalem.

The contents of the containers were sold by Avichai Weinstein, owner of P.A.D., and according to his lawyer, the shipment was on its way to Thailand.

"It's not arms, its only treads for armoured personnel carriers. It's not something that can kill people," said attorney Haim Misgav.

Misgav said the goods had been sold to a Thai company, and so should not be Israel's concern any longer. "The Thai company, which is the owner… can do whatever it wants with them," he said.

In Tehran, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson said: "The Islamic Republic of Iran has no sort of relationship with the Zionist regime and such propaganda suggests that Israel considers the world's public to be naive."

Israel's international crimes squad will examine the material from the Defence Ministry to decide if and when to question Weinstein. Weinstein and his former partner – and brother-in-law – Eli Cohen, have been questioned in the past about selling U.S. army surplus to Iran, but the inquiry did not yield definitive results.

It is unclear whether P.A.D. knew the shipment would end up in Iran and Weinstein was refusing to discuss the matter with the press last week. The police international crimes department will work with the German customs authorities to determine if there is cause for an investigation, and if there is, the Shin Bet will likely become involved.

Although the containers were sent to Hamburg on a Zim ship, the Israeli shipping company had nothing to do with the containers, Zim officials said. They said the containers were sent by another shipping agent.

The shipping documents in Zim's hands say the containers held "machinery," without specifying the nature of that machinery. Zim Antwerp I, the ship returning the containers to Israel, is due to dock in Ashdod on Sept. 7.

The last case involving Israeli arms sales to Iran was that of Nahum Manbar, a prominent Jerusalem businessman now serving an 18-year prison term after being convicted in 1998 on treason charges after he was found guilty of selling components for chemical munitions to Iran. He claimed he did so with the knowledge and approval of the intelligence community.

The treason law includes a death penalty, but it has never been applied.

Prior to the Manbar case, Israel was notoriously involved in the Reagan administration's arms for hostages effort, known as the Iran-Contra affair, in the 1980s, when through Israeli intermediaries, the United States. sold arms to Iran to free U.S. hostages and used the sale proceeds to finance arms for anti-Communist guerrillas in Central America.

Israel prepares for U.S. attack on Iraq

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

As speculation mounts that the United States is planning a massive operation to topple Saddam Hussein, Israel, having been attacked by Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War, is preparing for Iraqi chemical and biological attacks.

Last week, as the Bush administration ratcheted up its anti-Saddam rhetoric, Israel announced that 15,000 health care and hospitalworkers, police officers and soldiers would be inoculated against smallpox – a deadly virus Iraq may possess and could use if Saddam's repressive Baathist regime is cornered in what is likely to be a concerted American military campaign to oust him. Israel also informed its citizens that they should update their gas masks.

For the past six months, Washington has let it be known that regime change in Baghdad is its preferred policy, though the timing has yet to be determined. The United States seems ready to launch an assault without first defusing the Palestinian uprising, a surprising turn of events.

Last week, in the Bush administration's most powerful case for a pre-emptive strike, Vice-President Dick Cheney claimed that Saddam seeks to dominate the Middle East and take control of its oil supplies. Cheney added that he is close to acquiring nuclear arms and would not hesitate to use weapons of mass destruction.

In an unmistakable signal that Washington means business and will not be deterred by increasingly strident objections from its Arab and European allies, Cheney added that the return of United Nations arms inspectors to Iraq would provide "no assurance whatsoever of [Iraq's] compliance with UN resolutions."

Under these resolutions, passed after Iraq's defeat in the Gulf War, Iraq is obliged to destroy all weapons of mass destruction. From 1992 to 1998, UN inspectors found and destroyed many of Iraq's prohibited weapons, despite cat-and-mouse efforts by Iraq to obstruct their mission.

When the UN concluded that Iraq would continue to hamper their work, the inspectors were withdrawn, and the United States bombed Iraq from the air. Since then, Iraq has been free to develop its military arsenal without interference.

The basic assumption in Israel is that an American offensive aimed at unseating Saddam, which the Israeli government is encouraging, will automatically lead to an Iraqi attack on Israel.

Should Saddam feel that he and his regime are in jeopardy, he will lash out at Israel in an act of desperation, Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer said recently.

During the Gulf War, Saddam fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel, causing considerable property damage in Tel Aviv. He did so in an effort to break up the coalition against Iraq, but also in retaliation for Israel's 1981 destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor near Baghdad.

Prior to the Gulf War, Israel threatened to counter-attack if it was the object of Iraqi aggression.

"Whoever attacks Israel won't live to remember it," said David Levy, the foreign minister. But succumbing to U.S. pressure, Israel exercised remarkable restraint and refrained from retaliating.

Israeli and western intelligence services have no hard evidence that Iraq has an atomic bomb. But they believe that Iraq has stockpiled chemical and biological weapons that can be unleashed by jet aircraft, pilotless drones or long-range missiles.

Both Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Ben-Eliezer have warned that Israel will respond forcefully to any strike on its territory by Iraq. Some have speculated that Israel will resort to nuclear arms.

The commander of Israel's air force, Gen. Dan Halutz, has said that Israel is much better prepared today to handle an Iraqi attack.

In collaboration with the United States, Israel has developed the Arrow anti-missile, one of the most sophisticated systems in the world. Washington, too, has promised to ship Patriot missile batteries to Israel should war be imminent.

For Israeli children, walking to school can be a matter of survival.

Jewish National Fund is paving the way for safer travel in Israel.

Northern Israel, 7:30 a.m. Seven-year-old Avi starts off for school. He walks along a road in full view of the northern border. Stress is his constant companion.

Thanks to JNF, Avi will soon travel a new, safe and secure road now being constructed in geographically vulnerable areas. Hidden from the sight of those who would do harm, these security roads are costly to build but worth the expense if even one life is saved.

With your financial help, JNF can double, even triple, the miles of this vital security road that will make life more secure for Israeli families.

Today in Israel, Avi and thousands of school children like him need more than a blanket for security. They need our help.

Sisters working for a cause: Eat to the Beat

By REBECCA GLUCK
Special to The CJN

Sisters Abby and Lisa Slater were raised according to their parents' credo, "Do for your Jewish community and beyond." The credo stands strong today.

Abby, 44, a banker by profession with a keen business sense, and Lisa, 51, a certified nutritionist, long involved in food services, and currently the Bakery and Specialty Team Leader of downtown Toronto's Whole Foods organic food store, pooled their skills to form the ever-growing fund-raiser called Eat to the Beat.

Now in its seventh consecutive year, Eat to the Beat will take place at Roy Thomson Hall on Oct. 7. The event is the primary fund-raiser for Willow, a Toronto-based telephone service offering support and resources to breast cancer victims. Willow's service is provided by volunteers, all of whom are breast cancer survivors. Since it opened in 1994, it has been survivor-directed and is the only known facility in Toronto that offers non-medical, peer support.

Abby and Lisa have long been contributors to various charitable causes but never felt their contributions were substantial. The sisters had owned and operated the bakery café chain, BakeWorks, and in a campaign called PennyWorks, a penny for every bagel they sold was designated for a community charity. Still, the impact wasn't entirely satisfying.

"We were anxious to use our business to help others, aside from it being a profit venture," said Abby. "We didn't want to attach ourselves to a big organization because we weren't sure how much we could really give."

Shortly after the PennyWorks campaign was launched, Abby was invited to a fund-raising event for Willow. There she heard the heroic stories of breast cancer survivors, including the story of Sharon Hampson, of the entertaining trio Sharon Lois and Bram. Hampson, a founding member of Willow, and other women spoke openly about their fight against the disease. Their candour and strength inspired Abby: She and Lisa were going to focus their charitable efforts, both personally and corporately, on Willow.

Lisa's long-term involvement in the food business was to play a key role in their plans. She had co-chaired the first Taste-of-Toronto – a fund-raiser for The Daily Bread food bank featuring Toronto chefs – and was eager to involve women in a comparable setting for Willow.

"So often, women chefs play second fiddle to male chefs and it was time to put women in the spotlight," said Lisa.

So, Lisa set out to recruit a number of female chefs from the Toronto area. The idea was to present an evening of delectable foods, prepared on site before several hundred guests. With the purchase of an event ticket, participants would be free to sample the chefs' fare in unlimited quantities. Proceeds from ticket sales, combined with other activities of the evening, would go to Willow. In addition to food, the event would include a silent auction, live entertainment and a celebration of gastronomical creativity.

In its seven years, Eat to the Beat has grown from 20 women chefs to more than 40. Last year's event raised more than $190,000, contributing nearly one-third of Willow's operating budget.

The evening's silent auction will feature a Designer Showcase, which is a series of rooms created by some of Toronto's top interior designers – including Applecart Design, uw design group, Costa Design, Andree Beauchamp Design Consultants, and Just Two Creative Women Inc.

The event also attracts leading chefs. "The women chefs relish their involvement in such a purposeful event," remarked Lisa. It offers the chefs a chance to network while contributing to a worthy cause. The chefs cover the cost of all ingredients and prepare enough to feed several hundred attendees.

An added advantage for the chefs' participation is this year's launch of the first Eat to the Beat cookbook. It features the recipes of Eat to the Beat chefs of past and present. Amongst the contributors is the renowned Lillian Kaplan, dubbed the quintessential Jewish chef and credited as the inspiration to most Jewish bakers in Toronto today.

The name of the event, created by Abby, encapsulates the mood of the evening: savouring delicious dishes to the sound of live, upbeat music while raising money to help support a worthy cause. Each year, a swing band called The Advocats, comprised of a group of lawyers, perform. Like so many involved with the event, their performance is on a volunteer basis.

To order tickets, contact Willow at 416-778-5000 or order on line by visiting www.willow.org. Willow's toll free hotline is 1-888-778-3100.

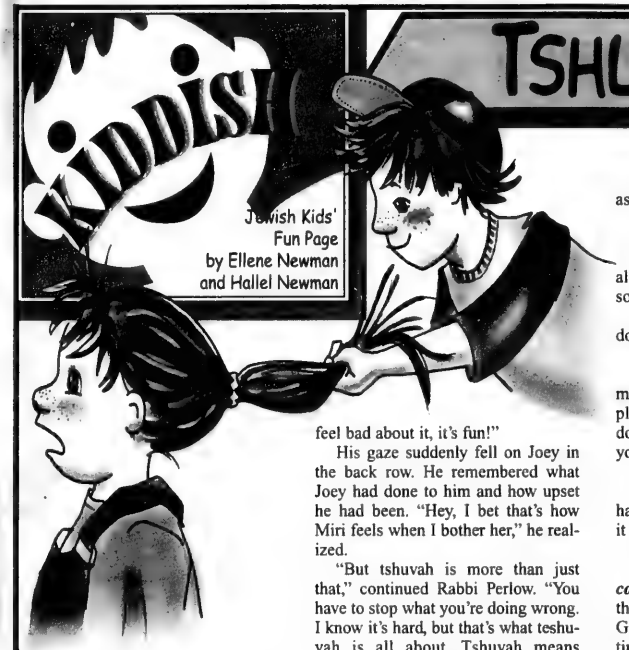
TSHUVAH



"Jacob, stop!" shrieked Miri as her brother yanked her ponytail.

"Why should I?" he laughed, giving it another pull.

"Mommmmy!"

"Jacob, stop that right now! You're going to be late for Sunday school," scolded his mother. Jacob grabbed his backpack and walked to the car.

When he arrived at the shul, he noticed his classmate Joey standing by the entrance. The two of them had never liked each other much. "Jacob," reminded his mother, "remember, Mrs. Tehrani is going to drive you home."

"Yeah. Thanks, Mom."

Jacob got out of the car and ran up the steps to the main entrance.

"Hey, Jake," leered Joey, knocking off Jacob's baseball cap.

"Stop it!"

"Why should I?"

Jacob was so angry he wanted to hit Joey, but Joey was much bigger and stronger than he was. Sighing, he picked up his baseball cap, dusted it off, and ran into class. He was late. Rabbi Perlow was saying, "Since Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are coming, we'll be learning about tshuvah, repentance. Everybody makes mistakes, but God allows us to repair them. To truly repent, you have to feel bad about what you've done wrong."

Jacob thought to himself, "I guess when I bother Miri and pull her hair, that's wrong. But I don't feel bad about it, it's fun!"

His gaze suddenly fell on Joey in the back row. He remembered what Joey had done to him and how upset he had been. "Hey, I bet that's how Miri feels when I bother her," he realized.

"But tshuvah is more than just that," continued Rabbi Perlow. "You have to stop what you're doing wrong. I know it's hard, but that's what teshuvah is all about. Tshuvah means returning, returning to-God."

On the way home, Jacob thought about how he treated his sister. He felt bad about it, but he didn't think he could stop.

He ran into the house. "Miri!" he screamed, feigning terror, "the police are here to arrest you! You're gonna go to jail . . . forever!"

Miri started crying. "No I'm not, no I'm not!"

"Jacob, what are you doing?" asked his father.

"I'm sorry," said Jacob.

"Are you really?"

"I sure am. Rabbi Perlow said we all have to feel bad when we do something wrong. And I do."

"If you feel bad, why do you keep doing it?"

"Cause I can't stop!"

"Of course you can. What you mean to say is that you can't completely stop right now. Nobody can do that, it's nearly impossible. But you can start stopping."

"How?"

"Well, if you pull your sister's hair 10 times a day and you only do it five times, that's tshuvah!"

"Really?"

"Absolutely. Of course it's not complete teshuvah, but it's a step in the right direction. And that's all God wants from you—one step at a time."

Jacob smiled. He could do tshuvah.

And he did.

Notebook and memories inspired Let Us Eat Cake

BY JUDY BART KANCIGOR

Journalism 1.1, Rule No. 1: The interview is about the interviewee, not about you. Ask a question, then listen. Obviously the instructor never met Sharon Boorstin, who is as interested in you as you are in her. My list of questions goes out the window.

With Boorstin you bond. The noted restaurant critic and food writer is already collecting food memories and recipes for a sequel to Let Us Eat Cake: Adventures in Food and Friendship (ReganBooks/HarperCollins), her tantalizing memoir, recipes included, of food, family and friendship, and we're invited to share by e-mailing her at sharonboorstin@aol.com.

"I'm fascinated by women and their relationships with their mothers and grandmothers and where they came from," she says. "I grew up in a family obsessed with food. With women's lib everything changed, and I wanted to explore how women's attitudes toward cooking and food changed as well."

She shows me a loose-leaf binder bulging with recipes, some handwritten, some on yellowed newsprint, dating back three decades to her newlywed days. The discovery of that long-forgotten notebook and the memories it recalled were the catalyst for Let Us Eat Cake.

Every recipe told a story: the brandied stuffed chicken legs she and friend Laurie slaved over to woo two brothers, a doctor and a lawyer (they never called back); the signature Canlis Salad from Seattle's best restaurant; her Yiddish-speaking grandmother's blintzes; her mom's legendary egg-bread stuffing.

"Food is actually a really good bonding thing. Everyone has it in common, and women talk about it easily," says Boorstin. "And I have the most fun talking to Jewish women, because they get it right away. They have all these stories and light up when they talk about their grandmothers."

Despite the differences in our backgrounds – Boorstin grew up in the "boonies" outside of Seattle where she and her sisters were the only Jewish kids in class; I was raised in a Jewish "ghetto" in a New York suburb – I found myself saying "me too!" on almost every page: Growing up in the '50s, the angst about boys, the love-hate relationship with food and obsession with dieting, the deep emotional connection with women friends, the ease of friendship in our 50s.

"You have what you've gone through together, what you have in common, and let go of old resentments," Boorstin says. "Life is precious, and you don't want to be petty."

In the '50s you learned cooking to catch a man, she observes. The book's grand finale Husband-Catcher Cake came from friend Mary Lou, whose college roommate's grandmother had advised, "Men can get sex from any woman, but not a good chocolate cake. And this one is good enough to get you a husband."

Readers of any age will relate to the connections Boorstin celebrates with the women in her life and share a giggle at her often hilarious food memories: the "salmon dowry" wrapped in newspaper she presents to her future in-laws (her dad was vice-president of a fish company) or gourmet potato pancakes fried by Suzy Gershman (of Born To Shop fame) in her muggy Paris apartment wearing panties and an apron (photo included).

Sharon Boorstin

Neither does Boorstin hold back the painful episodes in her life: her broken engagement (his therapist delivers the news), her sister's mental illness, the death of a soul mate, friendships extinguished and miraculously rekindled.

"Women bond over food the way men do over sports," she asserts as she cooks her way through life's triumphs and challenges. "On the afternoon of 9-11 I was so upset, I was crying and started making blintzes. I was sort of reattaching to my roots. It was very comforting."

When daughter Julia goes off to college, a puffy-eyed Boorstin seeks the solace of friend Joyce, who must know Boorstin well. "We'll have a glass of wine, we'll cook. You'll feel better," she tells her.

Scattered throughout are delicious vignettes starring famous foodie friends: Barbara Fairchild, editor-in-chief of Bon Appétit; La Brea Bakery's Nancy Silverton; Barbara Lazaroff, Wolfgang Puck's partner and wife; Mary Sue Milliken and Susan Feniger, the Two Hot Tamales; Paul Newman's daughter, Nell. Even Julia Child makes an appearance.

In the tradition of her mother and grandmother, Boorstin is a self-described shitarein cook. That's Yiddish for why measure? You just throw something in, and a wonderful dish emerges. Far from haphazard, it's a style born of confidence, instinct and skill. With Let Us Eat Cake the ebullient Boorstin has shitareined a delightful and tasty friendship stew.

MOM'S EGG-BREAD STUFFING

This is a recipe that cries out for improvisation; you can toss in just about anything that adds crunch and perhaps a bit of sweetness, and it will taste good. Just be sure you use egg bread as your base. It is also a recipe for which it is difficult to give precise measurements. Taste and adjust the ingredients and seasonings for flavour and texture. It makes enough for a 20-pound turkey with some left over to bake in a casserole.

4 to 5 loaves sliced egg bread, crusts removed
3 to 4 big onions, chopped
1 stick margarine
1 bunch celery, chopped
2 cups chopped mushrooms
1 each turkey giblet, heart and liver, chopped
1 to 2 tbsp.poultry seasoning
1 to 2 tbsp. salt
pepper to taste
1 to 1½ cups sliced water chestnuts, well drained
2 to 3 pippin or Granny Smith apples, chopped
1 to 1½ cups dried cranberries or chopped dried apricots
2 carrots, chopped (optional)
1 cup sunflower seeds or chopped walnuts or almonds (optional)
4 eggs, beaten
3 to 4 cups chicken broth, at room temperature

Cut the bread into cubes about 1½ inches square. Set aside for a day or two so that they dry out, tossing occasionally, or toast them lightly in a 350-degree oven, until they are crisp but not brown.

In a large, heavy pan over medium heat, sauté the onions in the margarine until they are soft, about 10 to 15 minutes. Stir frequently and be sure the onions do not burn. Add the celery, mushrooms, giblet, heart, liver and seasonings and cook over medium-high heat for 15 to 20 minutes, stirring often, until the turkey parts are cooked. Remove from the heat and let cool completely.

In a large pot, in batches, add the cooled onion giblet mixture and about ¾ of the bread cubes. Toss gently. (You may need to do this with two wooden spoons or with your hands.) In batches, add the water chestnuts, apples, dried fruit, and any optional ingredients, tossing gently after each addition.

In a separate dish, whisk the eggs with 3 cups of the broth, and gradually add the liquid to the stuffing mixture, blending gently. Add more broth-egg mixture and the remaining bread cubes if needed. You do not want the stuffing to be soggy, but it shouldn't be dry either. Adjust the poultry seasoning, salt and pepper to taste. Just before roasting the turkey, stuff it loosely – do not pack it in. Bake the remaining stuffing in a greased casserole, covered lightly with foil, at 350 for approximately an hour, until brown on top.

1/4 cup fruit-based liqueur to match the above (i.e. apricot brandy, raspberry eau de vie, or Grand Marnier)

For the frosting:
3 1/2 tbsp. light Karo (or other corn) syrup
1/2 stick butter
2 tbsp. water
1 tbsp. Kahlua, brandy, coffee liqueur, orange liqueur, or vanilla extract
1 cup semisweet chocolate chips

Cream together the butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add eggs one at a time, beating well after each, and then add the chocolate and the vanilla. Mix well.

Preheat the oven to 350. Add the baking soda and salt to the flour and mix. To the chocolate mixture, alternate adding the flour mixture and the buttermilk, a little of each at a time, beginning and ending the process with the dry ingredients. Do not overmix.

Pour the batter into 2 greased and floured or non-stick round cake pans, and bake for 30 to 35 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted into the middle of each cake comes out clean.

Cool the cakes on a wire rack. In a small saucepan, over boiling water, mix the filling ingredients well. Cool. Invert one cooled cake layer onto a serving plate, then spread on the cooled filling. Carefully top with other layer.

Cover gently but tightly with plastic wrap covered by aluminum foil and refrigerate overnight. Bring the cake to room temperature before icing. In a medium saucepan, mix the Karo syrup, butter, water and liqueur or vanilla, and bring to a boil. Stir in the chocolate chips. Let cool and stir until the frosting is the consistency of whipping cream. Frost top and sides of the cake.

Cake celebrates fall harvest

Children, adults and staff at the Brooklyn School for Special Children/Block Institute enjoy the fruits of creativity of the school's director of food services, Todd Adelman.

To celebrate the fall harvest season Adelman has developed this Pumpkin Apple Cake perfect for the festival of Sukkot.

Brooklyn School for Special Children/Block Institute is a not-for-profit, non-sectarian agency serving children and adults who are developmentally delayed. The education program serves children three to five years old both with and without developmental delay in an integrated setting. Adult programs include day habilitation, vocational training and residences.

PUMPKIN AND APPLE STREUSEL CAKE

For Apples:
3 tbsp. sweet butter
4 large Granny Smith apples
1/4 cup orange juice
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Core and peel apples. Dice apples and place in bowl. Add orange juice and toss to coat. Melt butter in large skillet. Drain apples, discard liquid. Add apples to skillet. Saute over medium high heat until apples begin to brown (approx. 5 min.). Add sugar and cinnamon and toss to coat. Saute until apples are golden brown (approx. 5 min.). Cool.

For Cake:
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1 cup light brown sugar (packed)
1/2 cup sweet butter
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup canned pumpkin purée
1/3 cup sour cream
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground cloves
1/2 tsp. ground nutmeg
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
1 tsp. baking soda
2 large eggs

Cut butter into small pieces. Preheat oven to 350. Grease 9-inch springform pan. Combine flour, brown sugar, butter and salt in large bowl. Beat in food processor (turning it on and off several times) until mixture resembles coarse meal. Remove 2/3 cup of mixture and set aside for streusel topping. Add pumpkin, sour cream, sugar, spices and baking soda to mixture in processor. Beat until smooth. Add eggs. Beat until smooth.

Pour batter into prepared pan. Smooth out top to even. Spoon apples evenly over batter. Sprinkle with reserved streusel topping. Bake for approx. 1 hour and 10 minutes, or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool for 15 minutes in pan. Remove from pan. Serve at room temperature.

Side dishes back up the main course

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

There comes a point in your menu planning when the main course and the dessert are done, and you realize you need more side dishes.

These dishes can be put together in under ½ hour and can be made in advance and reheated.

WILD RICE, PORTOBELLO AND BROCCOLI CASSEROLE

This fresh and crunchy wild rice recipe can be served hot or at room temperature. The vegetables can be varied according to your family's taste.

2½ cups cooked wild rice (⅔ cup uncooked)
¼ cup red pepper, diced
1 cup portobello mushrooms, sliced
¼ cup minced onions
2 cups fresh broccoli, cleaned, peeled, and cut into ¼-inch pieces
6 tbsp. olive oil
½ cup water chestnuts, sliced
salt and black pepper to taste

In a large pot or microwave-proof container, cook the rice in about 4 cups of lightly salted water. If you are cooking the rice on a conventional stove, simmer for about 35 minutes; in the microwave, bring the water to a boil, and cook the rice on medium-low for about 30 minutes.

The rice should be just tender and starting to open. Drain the water. Saute all the vegetables in the olive oil. When the vegetables are just starting to become crisp/tender remove them from the heat and add them to rice. Season with salt and pepper and then place the mixture in a greased oven-proof bowl and cover. This recipe can be made several hours in advance and then heated at 350 for about 20 minutes just before serving. Makes 10 servings

CURRIED PUMPKIN SOUP

I always try to serve plenty of squash and pumpkin dishes for yom tov. If you prefer to use fresh pumpkin or variety squashes, go ahead. You need to cook the raw vegetable in the broth until it is tender, and then purée the mixture before proceeding.

¼ cup olive oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 medium tart apple or quince, peeled and finely chopped
1 tbsp. curry powder
2 cups vegetable stock
1 lb. can pumpkin purée
3 tbsp. flour
3 cups of pareve creamer or rice or soy milk
salt and pepper to taste
⅓ cup toasted pine nuts to serve as a garnish

Heat half of the oil in a large pot, and gently saute the onion until translucent but not brown. Add the apple and saute until soft. Add the curry powder and cook for 2 minutes. Add the stock and pumpkin. Simmer for 5 minutes. In another pot, heat the remaining oil, stir in the flour, and cook for a minute. Then whisk in the milk or pareve creamer.

Cook until the mixture thickens slightly. Blend the two mixtures, adjust the seasoning, and serve with the toasted pine nuts. You can add more curry or some hot paprika if this is not spicy enough for you. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

SMOKED FISH AND POTATO SALAD

This salad is an unusual variation, combining the whitefish and a tangy dressing. Served on a bed of lettuce this salad is the perfect start to any meal.

1½ lb. smoked whitefish, skinned, boned and flaked
2 cups peeled, sliced cooked new red potatoes
1 cup thinly sliced, peeled cucumber
½ cup sliced black olives or Calamata olives
¼ cup thinly sliced carrot
¼ cup finely chopped onion
2 tbsp. fresh chopped parsley
½ cup mayonnaise
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. rice wine vinegar
salt and pepper to taste

In a large bowl combine the fish and potatoes, cucumber, olives, carrots and onion. Mix to combine and set aside. In another bowl combine the parsley, mayonnaise, mustard, lemon juice, vinegar and seasonings. Blend thoroughly, and add the dressing to the fish and potato mixture. Toss lightly. Serve chilled with lettuce and tomatoes. Serves 4 to 6.

CURRIED CORN SALAD

A totally amazing salad that only gets better the longer it sits and is equally compatible with poultry, fish or meat.

30 oz. canned corn
2 tbsp. olive oil
1½ cups diced red onion
1½ cups each green, red and yellow pepper, diced
1½ to 2 tsp. curry
½ tsp. dry oregano
salt and pepper
½ tsp. turmeric (optional)
¾ cup pimento stuffed green olives, sliced
1 to 2 tbsp. mayonnaise, or to taste

In a skillet heat oil and saute the onion for 2 minutes. Add the peppers and cook an additional 2 minutes and remove the mixture from the heat. Add the curry, oregano and turmeric and mix to combine. Cool slightly and add the salt, pepper, corn and mix to combine. At this point adjust the seasonings to your taste. Cover and refrigerate.

Just before serving stir in the green olives and mayonnaise and serve. Serves 6 to 8.

Vegetables – A healthy alternative for the holidays

By ROBERTA KALECHOFSKY
Special to The CJN

Dozens of delicious vegetarian dishes have become traditional for the Rosh Hashanah meal, such as tzimmes, apple dishes, stuffed dates and figs, fruit pilaf, rice pudding, spinach strudels, chickpeas and couscous, stuffed zucchini, kugel, candied fruits and plum pie.

We bind Rosh Hashanah to Yom Kippur with the custom of dipping challah: on Rosh Hashanah we dip challah in sweet honey, and on Yom Kippur, to break the fast, we dip challah in olive oil spiced with cumin.

For centuries, Jewish families have prepared for Rosh Hashanah by cleaning the house from top to bottom. The best cutlery is polished, the finest table linens, china and crystal are brought out. New clothes for the whole family at Rosh Hashanah are a long tradition.

While immaculate houses and elegant tables still honour the holiday, formality in dress disappeared in the liberating breezes of the '60s and '70s, when parents were pleased if post-adolescent children turned up at all and were grateful if they turned up neat and clean.

Many young people became vegetarians during this period, and the trend has persisted, along with a general move towards a lighter and more healthful diet.

Grown children often live too far away now to return for the holidays and many senior citizens seek an easier life in the sunbelt. This has given rise to new possible alternatives for enjoying the holidays. We may spend them now with neighbours, friends and colleagues who share the work of planning, shopping and cooking. Many of these groups form their own food traditions and establish menus that persist for years, with each cook contributing a specialty.

Traditional foods often continue to appear, no matter what shape the family or social unit takes. The most familiar symbolic foods for the holiday are the round challahs and the apple dipped in honey. The circular shape of the challah represents infinity, eternity, the New Year wish for a long life.

The apple reminds us of the Garden of Eden, though scholars believe that the fruit mentioned in the Bible was more likely a pomegranate than an apple; the sweet honey tempers our exile from Eden and conveys the hope for a sweet year ahead.

Many other dishes served at the dinner table are also sweetened with honey, carrying out this theme. Though most of us will buy honey in a jar from a supermarket, the honey that is cited among the seven sacred species of Israel was date honey. Honey from honeycombs probably did not exist in Israel until the era of the Roman occupation. Prior to this period, sweeteners were extracted from grapes, dates and figs.

Sephardi cooks offer foods that imply abundance and fertility by their very profusion: black-eyed peas, pomegranates (for the seeds), sesame seeds, grains of rice and couscous. When cooking the Rosh Hashanah couscous, they leave the lid of the pot slightly ajar to indicate that the year is not yet closed.

The head of the family recites special blessings, all beginning with Yehi ratzon. (May it be Thy will) over several kinds of vegetables whose names or appearance reflect the good things desired in the coming year.

For instance, a gourd stands for fullness, and the head of a fish, a rooster or other animal indicates the hope that all Israel, and each of us individually, will be the head, and not the tail – that we may go forward, not backward, in the year ahead.

This tradition is based on the passage in Deuteronomy 28:13: "and the Lord will make thee the head, and not the tail."

In The Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook, co-authored with Rosa Rasiel (Micah Publications), we symbolize that wish in the vegetable world, either by presenting a whole roasted head of garlic, or by using a whole head of beautiful red or green cabbage as part of a centerpiece. You can use all vegetables or a combination of vegetables and fruit, including, for example, a pomegranate, whose myriad seeds are said to equal the 613 commandments we hope to honour in the year ahead.

MOCK CHOPPED LIVER

Incredibly delicious and sure to be a favourite for other holidays as well. Can be prepared the day before.

½ package (1 cup) brown lentils
1 large diced onion
1 cup chopped walnuts
salt to taste

Put lentils in a 2- or 3-quart pot, and cover with water. Use water sparingly so that lentils absorb all the water. More water can be added as needed.

Bring water to a boil, partially cover and simmer for about 45 minutes. Check occasionally to make sure water has not boiled off, and add water as needed. Sauté onions until lightly golden and tender.

Purée lentils in food processor. Purée walnuts until slightly coarse. Mix all ingredients together. Salt to taste. Chill about 2 hours. Serve with crackers or rye bread, or on lettuce leaves.

LENTILS AND RICE WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS

⅔ cup dried lentils
1 small onion, halved
2 cups water
3 tbsp. oil
3 cups coarsely chopped onions
1 cup long grain rice
2 tsp. cumin or to taste
½ tsp. salt

In a medium saucepan, combine lentils, onion halves, and water. Bring to a boil, lower heat and simmer covered for 15 minutes.

Meanwhile, heat oil and sauté chopped onion in medium skillet over medium-high heat, stirring often, until onions are golden brown. Reduce heat and continue cooking, stirring occasionally until onions are a rich, dark brown, about 30 minutes. Set aside.

Drain lentil cooking liquid into a 2 cup measure. If necessary, add water to equal 2 cups. Discard onion halves. Return liquid to saucepan with rice, cumin and salt. Stir. Bring to a simmer and cook covered over very low heat until all liquid is absorbed and rice and lentils are tender, about 30 minutes.

Serve topped with caramelized onions. Serves 4-6.

SWEET POTATO APPLE BAKE

This longtime favorite is less sweet than similar dishes.

6 medium sweet potatoes
1½ to 2 cups thinly sliced Cortland apples lemon juice (optional, if needed)
½ cup brown sugar
3 tbsp. margarine
½ cup water or apple-cooking water cinnamon

Cook potatoes in boiling water to cover, 30-45 minutes until soft. Drain, cool and peel them. Cut them into ½ inch thick slices.

Meanwhile, cook apple slices in water barely to cover until almost tender. Drain and save the cooking water Preheat oven to 350.

In a greased baking dish, make alternate layers of potatoes and apples, sprinkle with brown sugar, lemon juice if using, and dash of cinnamon; dot with margarine. Pour ½ cup reserved apple water over them. Bake uncovered for 1 hour. Serves 6-8.

ZUCCHINI BAKED WITH RICE AND TOMATOES

Good company dish. A different way to combine these popular Mediterranean ingredients. Cook rice and onions in advance and assemble the dish at your convenience.

2 lb. zucchini, scrubbed, trimmed, and sliced.
2 cups sliced onions (about 2 medium)
3 medium tomatoes, sliced
1¼ cups rice
4 tbsp. olive oil, divided in half
1-2 tbsp. wine vinegar
1-2 cloves garlic, crushed salt
paprika
⅓ cup chopped fresh parsley

Cook rice in boiling water in usual fashion. In medium saucepan, sauté onions in 2 tbsp. oil until light golden brown.

Preheat oven to 350. Oil shallow baking dish. Arrange rice, zucchini, onions and tomatoes in alternate layers, ending with tomatoes on top. Bake 30 minutes or until zucchini slices are tender.

Meanwhile, make a dressing from remaining oil, vinegar, garlic, salt and paprika to taste. When ready to serve, sprinkle casserole with chopped parsley and pour dressing over all. Serves 8-12.

Wishing all our customers and friends a very Happy and Healthy New Year.

Remnants of Jewish life in a tiny corner of Italy

By GERALD SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

PITIGLIANO, Italy — In the middle of the beautifully wooded area of Tuscany known as the Marmare sits the medieval village of Pitigliano, known as La Piccola Gerusalemme.

I first heard about this village while researching places of Italian-Jewish interest on the Internet. After a month of studying Italian in Assisi, I had two weeks to travel freely. From Orvieto by bus, transferring in San Lorenzo, I arrived on a mid-Friday afternoon and quickly checked into the Albergo Guastini, the main family-owned inn.

I immediately went to the former Jewish ghetto and found the synagogue on Vicolo Manin off the Via Zuccarelli, in time for a tour of both the restored shul (from the 16th century and most recently restored in 1995) and the Jewish cemetery outside the walled town.

Signora Elena Servi, the wonderful Jewish-Italian hostess of the sinagoga from Pitigliano who speaks some Hebrew, and a wonderful local Italian gentleman showed me around.

Though today there is no Jewish community in Pitigliano, Jewish cultural events take place in the town.

The views from the women's balcony to the bimah below and to the green fields from the outside terrace are beautiful. A plaque outside honouring those deported by the Nazis to the death camps was unveiled in 2001.

The synagogue of Carmiel, in Israel, houses Pitigliano's 18th-century ark.

Besides the shul itself, there is a mikvah, matzah oven (forno delle azzime) and the local Jewish cemetery outside the walls.

Pitigliano sits in a mountainous area of Tuscany in the province of Grosetto, not far from the famous Terme Saturnia Spa. The town clings to a cliffside, with the original ghetto of cobble-stoned alleyways fully occupied and a living museum. Roman arches precede the ghetto's entrance and there is a Roman aqueduct at the valley's entrance below.

Like in Jerusalem, there is a "Welcome to Pitigliano" sign made from shrubbery and plants as you round the last turn before ascending to the town itself. Jews originally settled here in the 15th century for familiar reasons – escaping persecution in the nearby papal state, both the Medicis and the Lorenas gave them refuge.

Of course, there were restrictions, but despite this, the Jewish community flourished and prospered. They were involved in both local trade and agriculture (there is still an excellent kosher white wine produced here). At various times, they made up about 10-20 per cent of the local population and the town was an oasis of tranquillity until 1799, when the invasion of Napoleon and nearby pogroms occured.

In the golden years of Pitigliano's Jewish era, there was a kosher butcher and most women worked in the matzah factory that supplied a large area of Italy. The village was the birthplace of many notable sages and scholars including Samuel Colombo (rabbi of Livorno, Moses Montefiore's hometown) and the biologist Mazzini Pergola.

Wandering Pitigliano's narrow streets is delightful. The ancient city walls and arches, floodlit at night, are indeed reminiscent of Jerusalem. The local tourist office is one of the most organized and knowledgeable I found in all of Italy. The local population, estimated at 5,000 people, is wonderfully warm.

On Sunday, I returned to the synagogue to say goodbye to Signora Servi. She was busy welcoming both Italian and German tourists. I wished her sta bene (Italian for zei gezunt). A cousin of hers, Edda Servi Machlin, is a noted chef specializing in Italian Jewish cuisine, who has written cookbooks as well as a memoir about her youth in Pitigliano called Child of the Ghetto, Coming of Age in Fascist Italy: 1926-1946.

I left Pitigliano by direct bus to the railway station of Orbetello on the coast, which is on the main Rome-Livorno line, with mixed feelings of both sadness and joy. Sadness for what once was and existed no longer, and joy for the present public interest in the rich Jewish life that flourished in this lesser-known corner of Italy.

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5763, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

Toronto Yiddishist Shirley Kumove says that Austerlitz (Knopf, 2001) by W. G. Sebald "is a hard book to read, but it's certainly rewarding." The book focuses on the experiences of a young man sent to England on a kindertransport, but it is "not strong on narrative," she says. "It's a philosophical novel and narrative is not its strongest point.

"What's he's really talking about is the death of civilization. He's talking about the 20th century, the seminal event of which was the Shoah . . . It's really a meditation on what it means to be alive after such a horrible event, what it means in terms of civilization."

Kumove is currently compiling a third book of Yiddish sayings and translating an interwar Yiddish novel by Yehoshua Perle into English.

Totto-Chan, The Little Girl At the Window, by Japanese talk-show host Tetsuko Kuroyanagi (Kodansha NY, 1990) is a "beautifully written and very touching" memoir of her experiences in an alternative school in Japan, says Toronto musician and music teacher Brian Katz.

"In the school she discovers the beautiful details – the 'extraordinary in the ordinary' as the Buddhists say, the magic of the moment, the magic of doing the simplest things."

The book is a bestseller in Japan and internationally. "I'm drawn to it because I'm very involved in arts education. It presents a very holistic view of education. Rather than a top-down model where the curriculum is set from the outset, it presents a model in which the curriculum comes from the children's experiences."

Katz and fellow jazz-klezmer musician Martin Van de Ven released a new CD last week at the Ashkenaz Festival.

Helen Zukerman, administrator of the Zukerman Family Foundation and executive director of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, has been reading Six Days of War and the Making of the Modern Middle East, by Jerusalem-based historian Michael J. Oren (Oxford 2002).

Currently on the New York Times bestsellers' list, the book utilizes many new sources to provide a fresh account of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. It's a compelling read – "like a detective novel," Zukerman says.

"His theory is that history is made up of vicissitudes, missed opportunities and miscommunications, the consequences of which we never know until afterwards."

Oren is scheduled to speak at the Leah Posluns Theatre on October 20; the visit is sponsored by the Zukerman Family Foundation in connection with the Jewish Book Fair. Tickets are $10.

Toronto publisher and literary agent Malcolm Lester is highly impressed with Thinks, a "wonderful novel" by British writer David Lodge (Penguin Canada). "It has a very serious theme – namely, what is consciousness, and can we ever know what another person is thinking," he says.

Lester is also reading The Woman Who Laughed at God: The Untold History of the Jewish People, by Jonathan Kirsch (Viking). "The title refers to Sarah, who laughs when she's told by God that she's going to bear a child. Kirsch uses that as a kind of touchstone story that we (the Jews) can challenge accepted authority."

Arthur Conan Doyle

First published in 1901, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Hound of the Baskervilles has maintained its popularity over the century, and new print editions and film versions keep appearing, notes Barbara Rusch, chair of Holocaust Education Week, who re-read the classic work recently.

"Arguably, it's the greatest horror story ever written. It was really on the cutting edge of a new literary genre which combined Victorian gothic thriller with detective murder mystery. That's one of the things I find so interesting about it – it's so innovative."

Rusch is also president of the Ephemera Society of Canada and the Bootmakers of Toronto, a local Sherlock Holmes society. For a good Conan Doyle biography, she recommends Teller of Tales, by Daniel Stashower.

Still Life With A Bridle by the Polish poet Zbigniew Herbert (Ecco Press NY) "is a book about the golden age of Dutch painting," says Toronto poet Ken Sherman. "I would say it's a kind of long essay on Dutch art but it's really about much more than that. It's about what art is about and how it interrelates to society.

"It's really short. I like short books – unless you're talking about Tolstoy or somebody who can really write."

Sherman, who teaches at Sheridan College, is working on a new collection of essays.

Romanian-born Vladimir Radian plays many roles

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Though veteran performer Vladimir Radian has been onstage for years, he is awed at working with Michael Douglas.

"It's intimidating," Radian says, adding that it's also "a great chance to learn from direct interaction with a master of the craft – all day long, take after take, line after line."

The Romanian-born Radian, who is currently in Toronto with Douglas filming Till Death Do Us Part, is a poet, singer and songwriter as well as an actor. He has worked in film, radio and television and has performed in operas, Shakespearean dramas, operettas and other musical theatre.

This fall, he will be seen in Oliver Stone's film, Beyond Borders featuring Angelina Jolie. He recently appeared in The Threepenny Opera at the Persephone Theatre in Saskatoon in the title role of Macheath (Mack the Knife) and opposite Ben Affleck in a film adaptation of the Tom Clancy bestseller, The Sum of All Fears.

In November 1999, he hosted a concert titled Rozhinkes mit Mandlin (Raisins and Almonds), where he performed chassidic, Israeli, Yiddish and Broadway tunes.

Five years ago, his lyrics won a CBC competition and became the new text of the traditional Canadian anthem, The Maple Leaf Forever.

The versatile performer has also performed in the operas La Traviata, Un Ballo in Maschera and La Boheme and the title role in Don Giovanni; in the musicals The King and I, Kismet and Fiddler on the Roof; and in several Shakespearean plays, including Petruchio in The Taming of the Shrew.

Radian says what he loves most about performing is "the exquisite feeling of establishing a vibrant and true communication with the audience.

"What results in the best performances is... a feeling of togetherness, of being tsvishn menshn, of having touched and been touched in return," he says.

Radian, who received musical and acting training in Romania, came to Canada 12 years ago as a mathematician and computer scientist. For eight years before that, he lived in Israel, where he taught at the Israel Institute of Technology (known as the Technion).

Soon after he arrived in Toronto, he got a position in business, but says he "realized it wasn't the direction I wanted."

He began to take workshops in drama and music at the Royal Conservatory of Music and courses in film acting and dance and eventually gave up his job to pursue a stage career.

"To my delight, audiences seemed to respond to what I had to offer and I got more and more engagements," he says.

The move, he says, was natural.

"I was onstage since high school," he says. "I've always loved the theatre. [The activity of] teaching, the fact of being in front of a few dozen people, is akin to being onstage."

For his most recent engagement, the upcoming film Till Death Do Us Part, Radian plays a submarine commander. But he doesn't reveal much else.

"I'll just tell you that the film has spies and love and explosions and flying Jewish foot doctors," he says.

Legendary klezmer act to play Toronto

Boston's legendary Klezmer Conservatory Band (KCB) brings its raucous brand of klezmer stylings to the Hummingbird Centre for one night only on Thursday, Oct. 17 at 8:00pm.

Now in its 22nd season, the 11-piece KCB brings a lively, creative spirit to a rich and diverse musical heritage. Lusciously musical and overwhelmingly energetic, the KCB embodies 1,000 years of culture with their exquisite arrangements and lively rhythms.

Blending boisterous Jewish music from the old world, Yiddish theatre orchestrations that equal Broadway's finest and tunes infected with the rhythms of American jazz, they have emerged as a primary force in the current popular resurgence of eastern European and American Jewish music traditions around the globe.

Founder and bandleader Hankus Netsky (saxophone, accordion) is one of the world's foremost Jewish musicians and scholars, and chairman of the jazz studies department at the New England Conservatory where the band was formed in 1980.

KCB has performed concerts from coast to coast, regularly touring Europe, and has headlined international festivals including Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival in 1999. KCB recordings include Yiddishe Renaissance, Klez, A Touch of Klez, Oy Chanukah, A Jumpin' Night in the Garden of Eden, *Old World Beat, Live! Carlebach a hit at summer camp

Internationally known singer, composer and storyteller, Neshama Carlebach performed recently at Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont.

"It was strange and amazing to be back at home," says Carlebach, 27, who was born in New York and grew up in Toronto.

"Having never attended a camp as a child, I felt embraced and uplifted by the experience; singing with children of all ages and being surrounded by them is overwhelming and fulfilling."

Carlebach, who attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and York University and now lives in New York City, is following in the footsteps of her late father, Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

Recently, Carlebach, who travels extensively to perform throughout the world, spent the weekend in Ontario performing for campers and staff.

She also performed, accompanied by her five-piece band from New York, at three other Camp Ramahs in the United States, and various other camps.

"There is nothing like the feeling I had when the campers ran up to sing and dance with us on the stage," she says.

There is a joy that permeates Carlebach's soul music and her inimitable performance of her father's recognizable music. It is estimated that Shlomo created about 5,000 songs, of which 1,500 were recorded.

Performing at Camp Ramah in Ontario in a camp hall, Carlebach's powerful charisma and warm gestures captivated campers and staff throughout her concert which included some original songs.

Prior to his death in 1994, father and daughter, then 19, harmonized to Shlomo's music. They completed a recording titled HaNeshama Shel Shlomo. This was Shlomo's last recording, and the only recording they made together.

Carlebach continued performing for religious and secular audiences.

Her intimate style brings her audiences into her performance, and this was evident at Camp Ramah where she sang her diverse repertoire including Hebrew, religious and folk music in a warm and passionate manner.

Many of the young people were familiar with the melodies from her CD Dancing with My Soul and her latest release, Ani Shelach.

The spiritually evocative soprano says that her goal is "to present Judaism not as being difficult but as fulfilling."

When asked if she ever feels like she is standing in her father's shadow, she replied, "No, in his light."

Carlebach combines ancient melodies and gives them a modern dressing with touches of pop-jazz, Middle Eastern rhythms, swing and a bit of funk.

The campers were able to speak to her personally throughout the weekend.

Deb Filler aims for the stomach again

Love and food – what a delectable combination! Comedian Deb Filler combines the two in her new comedy Filler Up! playing Sept. 18 to Oct. 13 at the Artwood Theatre on 75 Portland St., Toronto.

Filler who wrote and starred in Punch Me In the Stomach, was originally from New Zealand, but now lives in Toronto. Filler Up! – which she also wrote and stars in – tells the story of a woman named Deb. Her father was a talented baker who did not have the heart to throw out the day's unsold baked goods. So he brought them home to his family. While Deb, and her mother, loved the goodies, her father always complained that the women were gaining too much weight.

The story touches upon many issues – the relationship between parents and children, our love/hate affair with food, and our striving to find our unique places in the world where we are loved for who we are.

Performances Wed-Sat 8 p.m.; matinees Sat & Sun 3 p.m.; and Sun 7 p.m. Tickets $20-$30. Call 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333 or visit www.ticketking.com

Business Profile

For the high-energy Roberts, time never stands still

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For Brian Roberts, diversification is the name of the game.

Diversification, his mantra and guiding principle, has taken his therapeutic body care company, Obus Forme, a nationally known brand, to greater heights in the last four years.

"Diversification has been very successful," said Roberts, the 42-year-old president. "It's opened up new markets for us."

A fitness enthusiast who holds a black belt in karate and boxes to let off steam, he inherited Obus Forme from his father Frank in 1998.

An American who settled in Canada in 1959, Frank Roberts was an industrial designer and importer who founded Obus Forme in his garage in 1980.

His claim to fame was a sleek lowback backrest. It helped millions of Canadians find relief from back pain and established Obus Forme on a firm footing.

As his son recalls, he developed it after hurting his back and cutting himself out of a plaster cast that had rendered him immobile.

When he took over the company, Roberts seized on diversification as a means by which to bolster sales and appeal to a new generation of consumers fixated by health and lifestyle products.

His first move was to change the company's tag line from "the back-care experts" to "the body-care experts."

Having reoriented itself, Obus Forme gradually unveiled a new line of products, ranging from three-position padded lift chairs and ultra foam ventilated mattress pads to massaging foot spas and sound therapy relaxation systems.

All in all, Obus Forme manufactures upwards of 200 products.

"The more we can offer the public, the better off we are," explained Roberts in an interview in his 30,000-square-foot factory in western Toronto.

And while his latest products have done wonders for Obus Forme's bottom line, backrests are still its mainstay.

A glance at Obus Forme's glossy catalogue confirms this.

There are specially-designed lowback and highback supports, side-to-side lateral supports, supporting rolls and a panoply of driver's seats.

Such is its dominance in the field that Obus Forme enjoys a near monopoly in backrests.

"In Canada, we own about 90 per cent of the backrest market," said Roberts.

Thanks to its new products, the majority of which are made in Asia, Obus Forme's sales have skyrocketed to a little under $100 million annually.

"Sales were significantly less when my father ran the business," he noted.

Seventy per cent of sales are in Canada, 25 per cent in the United States and the rest scattered around the world, including Israel.

"We have about 13,000 direct accounts," said Roberts, referring to the retail outlets, chiropractors and physiotherapists currently carrying the Obus Forme line.

He decided to source most new products in Asia – China, Vietnam, Thailand and South Korea – because labour costs are lower and turn-around times are much faster.

Three to four Asian factories, employing 1,200 workers, work exclusively for Obus Forme today. "They really want the business. They try hard to please, and they get the product out the door."

Roberts left no stone unturned to find suitable manufacturing plants in Asia. He attended trade shows, contacted embassies and read specialty magazines.

To keep competitors at bay, he declines to disclose his sources.

On average, Roberts travels to Asia four to six times a year, on trips that last about three weeks each. "I'm constantly there."

In a bid to lift Obus Forme's profile, he signed a licensing agreement with Nascar, the stockcar racing circuit in the United States.

Obus Forme makes motorized and non-motorized seat cushions that give drivers the advantage of a more comfortable ride.

"That helps sales because Nascar has a huge following," said Roberts.

As a result of this exposure, Wal-Mart has signed up Obus Forme as a licenced vendor.

Since succeeding his father, he has also modified the firm's dress code.

Obus Forme employees may now turn up in casual clothing. Roberts himself favours blue jeans and jerseys, except when he is making sales presentations.

"For years, I came into the office in a suit and tie. That's what I was brought up with."

The new dress code has been beneficial. As he put it, "It has opened up lines of communication for everyone here."

And in another new wrinkle, workers have been given more freedom to make decisions.

"I pride myself on delegating. As a business grows, you have to delegate. I can't oversee every step. Generally, I step back and let employees do their work. That's why they were hired."

He added: "I'm running the business by consensus. It's been working well. It gives me more time to spend on my family – [he and his wife Monica have four children aged eight to 14] – and on new product development, which I'm passionate about."

Roberts joined Obus Forme soon after his father invented his famous backrest.

"He needed help in selling it. I took the backrest around to chiropractors and physiotherapists, and it took off."

By agreeing to work with and for his father, Roberts gave up his ambition to become a veterinarian. Recently, however, he earned an MBA correspondence degree from Wexford University in Scotland.

"That," he observed, "was for my own gratification."

In the early years, Roberts' father was in charge of product development, while his son was responsible for sales and production.

"We had a nice little business that went smoothly. His death was a wake-up call for me. I had to put my own imprint on the business."

Roberts heads up a team of 110 employees in Toronto, compared to 40 prior to 1998.

When he is not travelling abroad, he spends much of his time dreaming up new products. His designers convert his ideas into practical, everyday products.

In keeping with his belief that Obus Forme cannot afford to succumb to complacency, he is getting ready to launch several new products in the next few months.

Young golfer represents Canada in Kids Championship

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Russell Budd has done something most golfers only dream of – compete for Canada at an international tournament.

True, he may be short, but so were you when you were 11 years old.

Russell recently joined 24 other Canadian youths at the U.S. Kids World Championship in Williamsburg, Va., a tournament that brought together 700 young golfers from around the world.

Representing 11-year-old boys from Eastern Canada, Russell shot 81 and 80 over two rounds, good enough to finish tied for 17th out of 63 in his age class.

His father, Michael Budd, said the "field was unbelievable," but Russell "had a really good showing."

Prior to heading south, Russell talked to The CJN about the pending international tournament.

"I'm excited to represent Canada and go on a trip," he said, clearly tired after just returning from a week at overnight camp. "[I know] I can't be nervous and [I have] to concentrate."

Russell scored an 84 in the qualifying tournament and parred a playoff hole with a 10-foot putt at the Oakridge Golf Club to clinch the title and a birth on the Canadian team.

Remarkably, he shot a 73 on the same course only a week before, marking a personal best in a game he has played since before he could walk.

When Russell was nine months old, his father brought home a golf instruction tape, which Russell said he "watched a lot."

"He loved that tape and kept wanting to watch it," his father added.

Soon baby Russell was using a spatula to chase a ball around the kitchen and by 2½, he joined his father on the links.

"I really enjoyed it," Russell said. "It looked fun and it got more fun when I got to play with my dad."

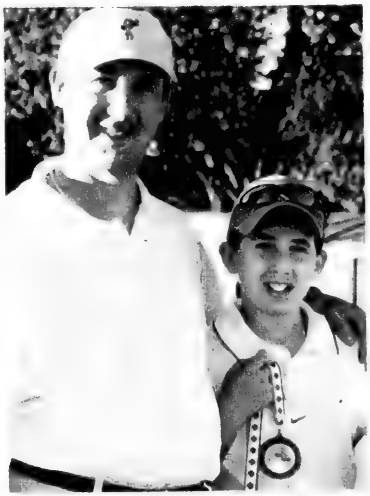
Russell has been competing provincially on the Canadian Junior Golf Association Tour since he was nine.

"We've always encouraged him," said Michael Budd. "I wouldn't have taken him [golfing] if he wasn't interested."

"It's the best to have my son play with me," added Budd, who used to import specially made golf club components to make a club small enough for Russell to use.

Russell's drives average 200 yards, which he claims is "not that far," but his short game and putting adequately makes up for it.

"[He] has a very good strategic mind. He can think his way through the game and knows where to put the ball," Budd added, about his son's talents. "All around he's a great athlete."



Michael and Russell Budd

Budd said Russell has only taken a few professional lessons.

"I spent years teaching him shots, club selection [and most importantly] proper golf etiquette," he said, adding that before every tournament they go over the course, make notes, and then go over the course again from the 18th hole backwards.

This seems like a lot of preparation for an 11-year-old, but, Russell said, "It's difficult and challenging, but I really enjoy it. My dad has taught me most of my [skills]."

Budd said the most difficult thing for the youngsters is the incredible amount of pressure they face at the tournaments. Caddies aren't permitted, so the young golfers are left to face the nerve-wracking course solo.

However, he said "he's proud of how he [Russell] handles himself on the golf course. He's an even-keeled kid; he always shakes the other kids' hands."

The most challenging aspect for the parents is the financial burden of financing a child to compete at a high level. According to Budd, there are very strict limits on sponsorship in amateur golf, so between proper equipment, practice rounds, tournament fees and travel costs, he spends around $6,000 a season.

"It's a very expensive sport," he said.

At 11, Russell still has years to develop his skills and improve his game. His ultimate goal is to play on the PGA Tour after attending Stanford University on a full scholarship.

In the short term, he said, he "wants to play in a few more qualifiers and to play in the Maccabiah Games."

Budd adds that being Jewish "is also a feather in [Russell's] cap, since there are not a lot of Jewish kids at this level. He's one of only a few Jews who has a chance to do well at golf."

Russell, who attends United Synagogue Day Schools, has also made made many "diverse" friends on the tour.

With one international tournament already under his belt, perhaps one day he'll take the torch from his idols Phil Mickelson, Sergio Garcia and Tom Kite and become a champion like them.

According to the CCF, a rating is a number that may range from about 300 to about 2800 (Grand Master). A player rated 100 points higher than another should expect to win five games out of eight. If the difference is 200, the higher rated player should win three of four; for 300 it's seven of eight. A player may become rated by competing in a CCF-rated event of three or more rounds. Ratings may go up or down based on results in CFC-sanctioned events.

By the way, there's another Kaufman making his presence known on the Canadian chess scene. Harris' younger brother, Elliot, 5, is the top kindergarten-aged player in Canada.

Harris sees chess as a something he'll continue with for years to come, but as nothing more than an intensive hobby. What he really wants to do is "work in the CIA," as a secret agent, or something.

"I like computers a lot. Maybe I can be a computer guy. It's an interesting job and I kind of want to work under cover," he said.

"I like excitement, action."

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

מלחמה זה דבר בוכה, מאת: תרצה אתר

החוצאה המחודשת של ספרה האנטי-מלחמתי של תרצה אתר משנת 1975, "מלחמה זה דבר בוכה", ממחישה לאסונו שנושא המלחמה שב לתודעתנו.

ספרה של תרצה אתר פורסם לראשונה שנתיים לאחר מלחמת יום כיפור. בחקר ספרות עברית לילדים מקובל להניח שמלחמה זו היתה המלחמה האחרונה שמתוארת בספרות "כמלחמה צודקת". משמע, כצירוף טראני של ארועים שאירעו כפו עלינו.

אני יודעת שהוא היה מכין ללכת.
אבל מלחמה זה דבר בוכה,
ואני בוכה בשקט.

מיום עבר, בלילה ישמר,
שם בגוין ישמר האב.
הנה תגדל, תהיה גבור -
תצאו לשמידה אז יחדו. (ע. הרופי)

אין בכך דבר יוצא דופן; בכל דור ודור ובכל חברה הורים מעבירים לילדים מסרים חינוכיים ומטען אידיאולוגי, בין השאר באמצעות הספרות שנכתבת עבור הילדים. התקווה היא שילדי הלאום יעוצבו בהתאם לערכים חברתיים מוסכמים. התפנית חלה כאמור לאחר מלחמת יום כיפור. אם בשל המחדל הפוליטי שקדם למלחמה ואם בשל האכזבה הקשה שהנצחון ב- 1967 לא הביא לשלום המיוחל, החלו לחישמע במדור הספרותי קולות בגנות מצב הלוחמה. בפעם הראשונה יש המערערים על עמדתנו הצודקת, וההתלבטויות המוסריות בשאלת הכיבוש המתמשך מדחיקות את נושא המלחמה מהספרות שנכתבת לדור העתיד.

התקופה שלאחר מלחמת יום כיפור ועד עצם היום מאופיינת בחילוקי דעות ערכיים ושסע אידיאולוגי-תרבותי-חברתי עמוק.

תרצה אתר הייתה אחת הראשונים מבין הסופרים לילדים שידעה להמחיש לילדים את המורכבות שבגישה אידיאולוגית שונה לתופעת המלחמה. אתר, ילידת תל אביב חייתה שחקנית בתיאטרון "הבימה", תרגמה מחזות וחיברה פזמונים ושירים למבוגרים ולילדים. היא נפטרה בטרם עת בשנת 1977.

כל שירי הקובץ, מלחמה זה דבר בוכה נמסרים על-ידי הילד הדובר ובכולם הילד מבטא התלבטויות בשאלת צדקת המלחמה. אין כאן חלילה ספקות בזכותנו להגן על חיינו וללחום על קיומנו העצמאי ואולם אין כבר בטחון מלא שזו אכן הדרך האפשרית הבלעדית:

נחלל שלי שלום
וגם דגישת שלום חמה...
תשמע: אני מודה לך מאד
על זה שאתה גבור ושומר עלי מכל רע.
מתי תחזר?
(מה זה "כל רע"? איש, או דבר?
אתה רואה אותו מהמקום שלך?...)

כאמור, לאחרונה, הוצאת הספרים של הקיבוץ המאוחד מצאה לנכון להוציא לאור שנית ספר זה לאחר למעלה מ- 25 "שנות הפוגה", שנים שבהן חיינו בהזייה חמימה של שלום שיבוא; נרחיב את הגבולות, נשריש לעצמנו גדרות בטחון בצורת עשרות התנחלויות בשטחים והפלסטינים מאוד ישמחו לראות בנו מפריחי שממות ובחפץ לב יסללו כבישים ויבנו לנו בתים יפים. החלום כיזוע התנפץ ושוב מוצאים להן חד מילותיה של תרצה אתר:

אם שלנו יפחדו וגם שלהם יפחדו
וכל אחד יאמר שהוא לא רוצה,
אז כל ראשי הממשלות יגידו:
'בסדר, מה נעשה?'...
נמרנו. תלכו הביתה כלכם...
(אולי הם יגידו: 'תתמשו לכם!'
אבל זה כבר לא אכפת לי.)

מי ייתן ותבוא שנה טובה, שנת שלום וברכה על כל ילדי ישראל וכל ילדי העולם.

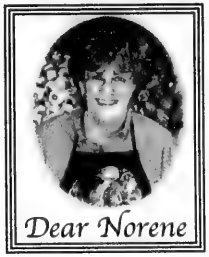
About Food



Dear Norene

What goes around, comes around! Rina Perry of Israel, an Internet foodie friend, wrote, "This recipe from Second Helpings Please has been in my possession for over 20 years. I make it every Rosh Hashanah. It has become 'my' cake. The recipe calls for raisins, but I seldom add them. When I do, I soak the raisins for ½ an hour in liquor and later drink it! I like to freeze this cake for 2 to 3 weeks before serving as I find it much tastier. Shanah Tovah Umetukah- Enjoy!"

'MY' HONEY CHIFFON CAKE

4 eggs
1 cup sugar
1 cup oil
1½ cups liquid honey
3 cups flour
3 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
1 cup strong cold coffee (or tea)
½ cup nuts, coarsely crushed (optional)
½ cup raisins (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. In an electric mixer, beat eggs and sugar until you get a nice yellow creamy mixture. Slowly add oil (like when making mayonnaise) and continue beating. Slowly add honey and mix until well blended. Beat on low speed while adding dry ingredients alternately with liquid. Stir in nuts and raisins,

Pour into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan or 3 loaf pans. Bake for 15 minutes at 350. Then reduce heat to 300 and bake 1 hour longer. When done, let cool 15 minutes, then invert and cool completely before removing from pan(s). Makes 18 servings.

Note: Tastes even better if made the day before. Cover and leave at room temperature. Before serving, dust with powdered sugar, if desired. Freezes well.

Dry Bones

The flag and the flower

Editorial

It is our great pleasure, once again, as has been our custom at this time of the year, to offer our readers an eclectic melange of holiday-time reading.

This year, our Rosh Hashanah Supplement is anchored by the responses of 20 individuals to our request that they write about the book or books that profoundly influenced their lives.

Each of the people whose responses we have published is someone who has tried or is trying still, to make a difference, to advance the state of the world. What were the words, whose were the thoughts, that stirred their hearts and inspired their souls to become who they are today? What can we learn from them? Their responses, we are certain you will agree, are fascinating to read.

But it is important to remember that all of us can make a difference, if we only but try. And that is why we feature the image of the flag and the geraniums: to remind us of that.

The flag, of course, is the symbol of the sovereign, democratic, Jewish state. It is also a tangible manifestation of the will to survive, of the strength and courage to overcome seemingly insurmountable forces.

Flowers are the tangible manifestation of beauty and goodness, aesthetics and symmetry, colour and light in God's world, His gift to humanity. Indeed, they are a reminder of His purpose for humanity.

Making a difference in the world follows the personal decision to try to advance, in measures appropriate to our circumstances, God's purpose for humanity – namely, the advancement of beauty and goodness on this earth.

But there is much more to read and see in the supplement, including an informative, provocative cri de coeur by educator and Holocaust survivor Eli Pfefferkorn concerning the administration and workings of the Claims Conference; a thoughtful essay by Haifa University scholar Amnon Reichman about the influence of the human rights jurisprudence of the Canadian legal system upon its Israeli counterpart; an essay by historian and travel writer Myriam Shechter about the history of the Jews of Amsterdam and a first-person narrative by Beverley Stern of the Jews of China. We have also included a photo essay of the Jews of Iran and a sampling of photos of key news events this past year.

It is our hope that our readers will find something in the wide array of material in this supplement to stir our own hearts and inspire our own souls, to help us all arrive at the decision to try to make a difference, too.

Shanah tovah.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5763

A moment of shock in Grade 7

By ROSIE SILBERMAN ABELLA

> 'Les Miserables taught me that life wasn't wonderfully serendipitous for everyone'

Soon after we arrived in Canada, and very soon after I learned how to read, my mother took me to the neighbourhood public library, took out three books for me and said, "Next week, we'll go and get three more."

This started what became a tradition for the remaining years we lived at Oakwood and St. Clair avenues: every Friday after school, my sister and I would walk to the public library on Dufferin Street, drop off last week's supply and pick up three new books.

To this day, I can remember the excitement of being able to choose any book I wanted in the wonderfully-stocked children's section of the library. The librarians were the first adults outside my family I relied on and trusted for advice. They took my questions, wisely interpreted them as expressions of interest and found the books to match.

I came especially to enjoy historical fiction, discovering that I loved learning about the past, but that I preferred by far to learn it through a good, well-written story. This is how I came to learn about such things as the Underground Railroad, the British monarchs, European musicians and the two men who would become my childhood heroes – Napoleon and Caesar.

My summer reading was pure sorbet – Nancy Drew mysteries and comic books, both of which I devoured in July and August because I was not allowed to read them during the school year.

Because it was the children's section, all the books I read had happy endings. And so, combined with the inevitably happy endings I saw in the movies I was allowed to see, the world, it seemed to me, was an incredibly upbeat place where good things happened to good people and everything worked out the way it was supposed to.

Then one day, when I was in Grade 7, one of the librarians gave me Les Miserables by Victor Hugo. It changed me. Here was poverty, despair and gross injustice, revealed through beautiful literature painting a picture of what humanity's lament looks like in a world without compassion. How could any civilized society tolerate the imprisonment of a person for stealing a loaf of bread? I was shocked.

I was also hooked. I wanted more of those long, poignant and mellifluous subjunctive clauses describing lives my other books had clothed in gossamer optimism, denying me access to the intense pain of other people's reality. So I moved seamlessly from the insensitivity of the French in Hugo to the brutality of the Russians in Tolstoy and Dostoevsky before I finished public school.

I have no doubt that I missed much in those books because much of what I was reading was far beyond the interpretive range of a halcyon childhood. But I do know that what I did understand transformed me from an unabashed youthful optimist to a pessimistic and cautious one.

On the other hand, I think those books gave me the tools to begin to understand what had happened to my parents, who had always presented life to us as wonderfully serendipitous rather than fatefully calamitous. In the joyful refuge that was our home, my parents taught me to think of the world as safe, accessible and worthy of my confidence. Les Miserables taught me that that wasn't the way the world was for everyone.

And then I realized that, for the four years they had been in concentration camps, that wasn't the way the world had been for my parents, either. Their resilience and hope had masked their reality for me, just as my childhood books had masked the world's reality.

But reading Les Miserables, my brain woke up. Open your eyes, it said. There has been, there is, there will be, human suffering all around you. What are you going to do about it...?

An 'aha' experience

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

It is clear to me as if it happened yesterday, even though it happened about 30 years ago.

I was in my sister's house in Hartford, Conn., for a visit, and happened upon a book titled The Wit and Wisdom of Mark Twain (I'm pretty sure it was Twain). It was a very small book of quotes, published by Peter Pauper Press.

I read the book, cover-to-cover, in one sitting in the meditation room. I have no idea what possessed me to do so, but as soon as I got out of the bathroom, I asked my sister for permission to make a long distance call. I found out the phone number of Peter Pauper Press, called and asked for the editor, whose name was Edna Beilinson.

Luckily, she was in and took my call. Would you be interested in a book titled Wit and Wisdom of the Talmud? I asked. Absolutely, she responded. Well, I said, I am ready to do it. Send me in a few samples, she said, and I will get back to you. She had her samples in a few days, and the complete manuscript within a month.

This was an easy, almost too easy, book to write, the easiest I have ever done, by far. All it was was a selection of pertinent quotes from the Talmud. But more importantly, it eased me into writing more books, and as such, The Wit and Wisdom of Mark Twain ranks as one the books that has made a difference in my life, even though it cannot possibly rank as an important book.

Another book which affected me greatly was Raymond Moody's Life after Life. This was one of the first books to admit the concept of afterlife into the realm of "reasonable possibility."

In my first years of serving as a rabbi, the idea of afterlife was considered totally beyond reason. The general population did not believe afterlife was even a possibility. This was unfortunate for many rabbis who would have loved to include the notion of afterlife in conversation with bereaved families.

Believers readily accepted the reality of afterlife. It was for those whose belief was not that strong that afterlife could have been helpful. But since it was so cavalierly dismissed, it was difficult to propose its existence to the bereaved.

Then along came Moody, and others. Putting aside whether their proofs for the existence of afterlife are scientifically valid, it is beyond debate that they succeeded in placing the idea of afterlife back on the list of acceptable postulates for reasonable people.

This was of immense help to rabbis as they sought to comfort distraught families and people on the verge of dying. I remember actually giving out copies of Moody's book and strongly recommending that bereaved families read it.

It is now standard fare for me to bring up the topic of afterlife when visiting with families in bereavement. People are more receptive to the reality of afterlife, are comforted by the thought and are somewhat uplifted during very trying times.

Finally, I reflect on the book that had the strongest impact on my thinking in the area of psychology and Judaism. I was interested in the connection between these two domains for many years, and had developed some conceptual linkages between them.

It was when I read Viktor Frankl's The Doctor and the Soul (not Man's Search for Meaning, which is a terrific book but for other reasons), that I had an "aha" experience.

Herein was articulated an approach to psychology which was remarkably (though not totally) consistent with Jewish values and ideas.

This book, The Doctor and the Soul, was the basis for my master's and doctoral research at the University of Ottawa. As well, it was the foundation for my book, The Quest for Ultimate Meaning, and other articles and subsequent books.

But more importantly, it coloured my approach to life, and to the rabbinate. My speeches focused on the importance of meaning as the dominant motif in life. And my counselling became strongly meaning-centred.

I have often been asked how a book like The Doctor and the Soul, or any book for that matter, could colour my approach to Judaism. After all, if Judaism is complete with the Torah, why do I need anything else?

In truth, there is little in this book, or in all of logotherapy, that is not already articulated or hinted at in Jewish sources. (Logotherapy, a method developed by Frankl, helps people's re-orientation and recovery by strenghtening their trust in the unconditional meaningfulness of life and in their dignity). But you can look at these sources long and hard and still not glean messages unless your mind is channeled in that direction.

Logotherapy of the Frankl vintage prided itself not in formulating new truths, but in rediscovering old ones. That logotherapy was conceived with such a profound appreciation of age-old tradition was in itself astounding, since this was coming at a time when psychological wisdom was challenging previously accepted norms and traditions.

Logotherapy is very talmudic in more than the fact that its views are consistent with the Talmud. It is also talmudic in approach, answering questions with questions, turning assumptions upside down to eventually land right side up.

As examples, logotherapy, like the Talmud, sees death as a positive force in life, for if we lived forever, we would forever procrastinate. Logotherapy likewise sees the value of

Balancing work and family: Golda Meir

By ELINOR CAPLAN

As a mother of four and a grandmother of six, I have tried to instil in my family a love of reading and education. Books have the power to teach, to inspire and to provide an escape from an otherwise hectic world into one with boundaries limited only by one's imagination. And no matter where your interests lie, there is a book for you.

As the member of Parliament for Thornhill and the minister of national revenue in the government of Canada, I dedicate a great deal of time and energy to serving my constituents and all Canadians. In my personal life, I try to put that same energy towards creating a loving environment for my family where we can all grow, learn from and appreciate each other.

While politics is a very demanding field, there are some who have been able to find the balance between work and family. In that regard, the autobiography of the late Golda Meir, My Life, made an indelible impact on me. Her memoirs speak to her desire to be involved in public life and to her constant concern about whether she could provide for her children.

As a Jewish woman serving in the cabinet of the government of Canada, Golda has been a role model for me. I would not presume to compare myself to her, but I take many lessons from her. She embodied many of the same ideals and values I hold dear.

She came from humble beginnings, not unlike many members of our community. Growing up in a Jewish neighbourhood in the Ukraine, she and her family managed to survive in an environment rampant with anti-Semitism. In fact, one of Golda's memories of her childhood is of her father barricading their home against a pogrom by Cossacks.

Golda and her family eventually were lucky enough to escape. They immigrated in 1906 to what many Jews called the Goldene Medineh (Golden Land), the United States. My family, originating in Poland, was also able to take the transatlantic voyage from eastern Europe to Canada, which would prove to be a land of opportunity for many Jews. While Golda lived in Milwaukee, Wis., she could not sit idle as the world passed by, but was determined to find important causes to support. Although her memories of her early childhood are few, the period when she began to get involved in the community is filled with stories that helped define her character.

In the United States, she soon became involved in the Zionist movement, and in 1921, immigrated to what is now the State of Israel. Her dedication to Zionism, in words and action, earned her the respect of the Jewish leaders in the community and she quickly became an important member in their ranks. After the creation of the State of Israel, she served in many positions within the government, culminating in her election as prime minister in 1969.

In retrospect, Golda's story is indeed one of triumph and success. But to examine her life in full is to understand what real struggles she faced. As a labour Zionist leader, and in the government of Israel as minister of labour, foreign affairs and, lastly as prime minister, she worked in a region and profession that was, and still is, dominated by men. As a Jewish woman in politics, I read her story with disbelief and in awe of all her accomplishments, both personal and public.

Although this book was written some time ago, it now has taken on a different meaning for me. It is not just the memoirs of an extraordinary woman I admire, but also a personal account of the struggle that all Israelis faced in the early years and still face today. Moreover, the reaction of Jews in the Diaspora during her life is the same for those of us living in the Diaspora today. We all anxiously read the newspapers and watch the news. We all debate the issues with our friends and family and with our loved ones living in Israel.

There is no doubt that all of us wish for a peaceful resolution to the ongoing conflict. We despair that the violence occurring now does nothing to help, but instead causes the unnecessary loss of lives.

It is my hope that because of the relevance today of Golda Meir's autobiography, many of you will read it. Everyone interested in the Middle East will find this book an essential piece of a complex puzzle that provides a personal face to the continuing story. There are still lessons that can be learned and many stories that are little known.

In 1938, Golda stated to the world, "There is only one thing I hope to see before I die and that is that my people should not need expressions of sympathy anymore." I believe this still holds true for today and I hope that her spirit and dream lives on.

Seven influences chosen from many

By JACK DIAMOND

By choosing seven books that have influenced my thoughts, it might appear that these are in some way greatly distinguished from the many other books whose contributions to my intellectual development have also been important to me.

This, of course, is not the case; there is such a vast legacy of writing on which to draw, one that covers so many fields. Some authors, such as Jane Jacobs, challenge old orthodoxies, always an exciting prospect; some, such as Henry James and Amos Oz, convey much through nuances of meaning; others, such as Lewis Mumford, reveal about the human condition through their compassion. There are those who charm and seduce, such as Pablo Neruda. Yet others scintillate with their brilliance and insight, such as Henry Roth. Some mesmerize with their love and use of language and oratory, such as Winston Churchill, of whom John Kennedy said, "He marshalled the English language and sent it in to war." There are those whose economy of words enhances the power of language, such as Abraham Lincoln. So in these chosen seven, there is a certain degree of arbitrariness. Nevertheless, they did and do have an effect on the shape and direction of my thinking. I hope they have also affected my actions.

1. Swallows and Amazons by Arthur Ransome.

Ransome created a world in which children were trusted and treated as responsible beings. It was also a self-contained world of ineffable satisfaction. Although far removed from the world in which I lived, I could imagine the sublime experience of being in a barge, sleeping on a bunk and hearing the waters of the canal lapping against the hull, and of travelling through peaceful countrysides.

Children generally feel powerless and puny, and hence are attracted to Superman in his many manifestations. The lives that the children led in Swallows and Amazons and other Ransome books, while empowered, were more credible than Superman, and therefore, utterly desirable. I envied them, dreamt of being with them on their adventures. Even when they took their parents along, the parents were like friends and treated the children as equals.

From these books, I realized that through reading, I could live in many worlds. It became a ritual to take a book out of the library every Saturday morning after shul. I can still feel the atmosphere of the children's library in the old Durban city hall – a heavy, masonry Edwardian building of mannered, classical detailing and interiors of dark mahogany.

Mostly I remember the wholesome odour of the books and the anticipation of stepping through the covers of a book such as Through The Looking Glass by Lewis Carroll, into gratifying worlds of the author's and my imagination. It would be hard to measure the accumulated pleasure I've derived from reading since those childhood days. I cannot imagine life without a book and the anticipated pleasure of books yet to be read.

2. Le Rouge et le Noir by Stendhal (Henri Beyle).

I read Stendhal as a teenager. I was stunned by his insight into human behaviour, and I marvelled at his ability to articulate the subtleties of feeling with such startling clarity. He also did what any great artist does: create a complete world of his sensibility. And the charm and intrigue of that world was revealed through the filters of what people said to reach an understanding of what they meant.

3. The Culture of Cities by Lewis Mumford.

The common perception of the medieval world is that it was one of filth and ignorance – the so-called "Dark Ages." But in fact, it was the breakdown of the balanced, ordered and healthy early Middle Ages that led to the decline in the late Middle Ages that is now taken as representing the entire period. In his description of the medieval economy, agriculture, city structure and its drainage systems, indeed its attention to what we now call sustainability, Mumford at once dispels myths and lays out the principles on which any society must be based to keep itself in ecological balance. Of course, by successfully challenging a common misconception, he also encourages independence of thought, a necessary attribute in a healthy society.

4. Space, Time and Architecture by Siegfried Gideon.

I suspect most people consciously or unconsciously seek some intellectual structure that provides the framework for understanding life, or the world they inhabit. There are many metaphysical constructs – religion being one. For the skeptical this is often not enough in general and, of course, for any particular field, clearly inadequate.

Space, Time and Architecture (the title itself is indicative of Gideon's aim at comprehensiveness) was the first to offer me such an encompassing view. I was entirely persuaded by his erudition, breadth and, as I thought, novel view. It is perhaps a predilection of German culture (a culture that permeated Jewish intellectual thought from the 18th to the 20th centuries) to provide systemic formulae. After all, Einstein's epochal $e=mc^2$ might perhaps be the epitome of such intellectual enterprise, and perhaps today the whole notion of convergence is the outcome of such constructs.

'The future of Judaism cannot be taken for granted'

By YEHEZKEL DROR

The thread of a person's life has many strands, with different books influencing multiple dimensions of consciousness, sense of destiny and choice. I would like to present three books that significantly influenced what constitutes a core part of my life, namely, trying to make – however minor – a contribution to assuring the long-term thriving of Judaism and the Jewish people with Jewish Israel as their central state.

The first book is Emil Fackenheim's To Mend the World: Foundations of Post-Holocaust Jewish Thought (New York: Schocken, 1982, republished in 1994 by Indiana University Press).

Fackenheim, one of the greatest philosophers of Judaism of our time, wrote many books dealing with various aspects of Jewish thought and existence. But this, I think – and so does he, as I found out in a conversation I had with him – is his most important one. Its main gist, as I understood it, and which influenced me profoundly, can be summed up as follows: Jewish history has gone through quite a number of "ruptures," but the Shoah (a term I prefer to Holocaust and its meaning of "fire sacrifice") is the most radical one, constituting an unthinkable "novum" that requires radical re-evaluation of all we believe in – however hopeless efforts to "understand" it may be. But lack of comprehension must not paralyze our will. Rather, the main imperative to be derived from the abyss of the Shoah is what Fackenheim, also in earlier writings, calls the "614th commandment" or "commanding Voice of Auschwitz."

This commandment requires us to make sure that Judaism and the Jewish people survive and thrive, come what may. This somewhat reformulated idea became the leitmotif of my book Refounding of Zionism (published in Hebrew in 1997, English version in progress), which I postulated as the "categorical imperative" for Zionism and "Jewish people policy" as a whole. The 614th commandment of Fackenheim eventually became a main rationale and grounding of all my thoughts and actions.

The second book – and this may come as quite a surprise – is Jacques Gernet's A History of Chinese Civilization (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1982, first published in French in 1972. A revised English edition was published in 1995). This book provides a long-term history of the Chinese people and culture, seen as a "civilization." It integrates cultural, intellectual, political, social and economic developments into a holistic "long- term history" from the Shang period (17th century BCE) to the death of Mao Tse-tung (1976).

What is striking about this book, in many respects influenced by the Annals School of history developed mainly by Fernand Braudel, is the illumination of continuity and evolution through periods of rise and decline, stability and crises, subjugation and victory, occupation and dominance and creativity and stagnation – all explaining the realities of China today and providing the basis for its future development.

This book helped me crystallize the concept of Judaism and the Jewish people as a civilization (as posed, inter alia, though differently, by Mordecai Kaplan in his 1934 book Judaism as a Civilization), rather than a "nation" in the western sense of that term. It also made me acutely aware of the lack of comparable modern, long-term, multi-dimensional and comprehensive high-quality histories of the Jewish people and Jewish civilization, in the tradition of Heinrich Graetz, Simon Dubnow and Salo Baron.

But the most striking sense I got from Gernet's book is one of a fateful dilemma facing the Jewish people: on one hand, our epoch is but a short slice of time in the long history of the Jewish people and Judaism, in between a long past and an unknowable but hopefully limitless (in human terms as well as globally) future. On the other hand, we have a strong feeling that our epoch is one of determinative influence on the future of Judaism and the Jewish people, for better or worse – and that, therefore, our unavoidable task is to make choices of historic significance, however shrouded in uncertainty and inconceivability.

Here, my long-standing professional interests in policy planning and my theoretic and applied work on choices that shape the future converge with the tragic view of civilization I got from Gernet's book (as augmented by Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik's book discussed below). True, China evolved through fluctuating cycles of rise and decline. And the Jewish people, though very differently so, also survived and often engaged in peak creativity despite exile, prosecution and the Shoah, with the peak achievement being the re-establishment of a Jewish state in the Promised Land. However, while the long-term survival and significance of China is not in doubt, unless humanity destroys itself, the long-term future of Judaism and the Jewish people, including the Jewish nature of the State of Israel, cannot be taken for granted.

Accordingly, though the quality of future-shaping choices made by China is very important, its existence is not at stake. In contrast, the quality of future-shaping choices of the Jewish people and of Israel may well make the difference between thriving and endangering survival. Therefore, the quality of collective choice is for us of fateful importance.

Three thinkers who inspired

By EMIL FACKENHEIM

When I was in my late teens in Germany, I was impressed by Martin Buber's work on the Chassidim, such as Hasidism and Modern Man and The Origin and Meaning of Hasidism. In particular, I was impressed with his assertion that Chassidism was a reform movement still valid, not because they eliminated or reduced the rituals of Judaism, but because they re-emphasized them. This was the time when Nazis took over Germany. I still think Buber is great.

But later, when Buber could not cope with the evil of Nazism, the early books of Elie Wiesel were inspiring to me: he was the first one whose work I read and whom I subsequently met in person who asserted both the catastrophic nature of the Holocaust and the re-affirmation of Judaism – not despite Nazism, but because of it. Once, when we were walking together in New York, I asked him about his most celebrated story: the Nazis were hanging three Jews, one of them a boy, and a man behind Wiesel asked, "Where is God now?" In his own mind, Wiesel replied, "He is there hanging with this boy."

I asked Wiesel now whether he meant that reply as Christians did, but Wiesel replied, "I cannot accept a God without power." Hence, Wiesel had to struggle with God as Jacob once did and it is inspiring that he does not give up the struggle.

But there is also a philosopher who impressed me, and a German yet. I have spent no fewer than 10 years studying Georg Hegel, in my view the greatest modern philosopher. I discovered one thing about him no one else seems to have bothered with: his astounding fairness about Jews, rare among philosophers. Hegel thought Islam's monotheistic stubbornness was just fanatical, but that Jewish stubbornness was "admirable." He thought not only of Job but of Moses, even of Abraham as a Job of sorts, and of the Jewish people as a "collective Job": they never gave up their belief that God is just as he was to Job in the end. Hegel would have been most impressed that Jews recite Job at funerals and that the Kaddish only glorifies God.

Hegel, of course, was a Christian, hence he thought Christianity was the true religion. But he thought that the Christian religion would become true only if Jewish resistance to it was no longer necessary, if emancipation for Jews was complete.

Like Adolf Hitler, Hegel, therefore, had a "Jewish problem." But their solution could not have been more opposed. It is a tragedy for Jews, but also for Germans that Hegel's philosophy did not win out.

Emil Fackenheim is a former University of Toronto and Hebrew University philosophy professor. He lives in Jerusalem.

An 'aha' experience

boredom, since if we were not bored, we would not be motivated to overcome it.

Logotherapy was also the first psychological system to entertain the distinct possibility of afterlife, as the place wherein ultimate meaning resides. After reading through The Doctor and the Soul, one cannot help but feel even more confident when espousing Jewish values.

I even use a Frankl-type technique with bar and bat mitzvah kids. I ask them if they are nervous, just in case they have not already articulated their nervousness, which they do most of the time.

Instead of following the normal reflex of saying, "Relax, do not be nervous, everything will be okay," I use what is called paradoxical intention. I express delight that they are nervous, tell them how important it is to be nervous and encourage them to try to be even more nervous than they are. Most of the time this method works. All of the time, it works better than telling these children not to be nervous.

It is an odd trio of books that affected on me in different ways. The first was an almost nothing book that got me writing, the second addressed the prevailing view that life ended in nothingness, and the third affirmed the unconditional meaningfulness of life, no matter what the circumstances.

So, if the opportunity comes your way, read them.

A primer on women and Judaism

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

Sometimes you find yourself reading a novel where you totally relate to one of the characters. The novel grabs you because it feels familiar and you see your own life reflected. You might even feel that one of the characters is you. But it is rare to read a non-fiction book and feel the same way; a book that so resonates, so completely reflects your vision and your beliefs, that you find yourself in it on every page.

That is the way I felt in 1990 when I first read Judith Plaskow's Standing Again at Sinai (Harper Collins). Now considered a classic on the subject of women and Judaism, back then it broke such new ground that almost every Jewish woman I knew had either read it, recommended it or was waiting to read it. It simply said all the things that I had always felt about the role of women in Judaism but had never heard anyone articulate so well before.

Back then, it was considered radical. Now, it is considered the "primer" on the issues of feminist theology. Now it is on the syllabus of every women in Judaism or feminist theology class. If it isn't, it should be.

In this book, Plaskow sets the groundwork for a re-imagining of Jewish history, theology and ritual to include the voices, experiences and vision of women. She tackles time-honoured ideas: what we mean by community; how we imagine God; who defines ritual; what power has to do with religion; the intersections of gender, sexuality and spirituality; and the whole notion of "normative" Jewish tradition. Women's marginality in Torah and Halachah, along with the whole notion of what marginality means, is carefully analyzed through a socio-historic lens. She treats each subject with equal doses of reverence, scholarship, passion, humour and empathy. This is not an angry book, but rather, a hopeful one, as she situates women back into the experience at Sinai. Plaskow is a deeply committed Jew and her commitment shines through her critique. Standing Again at Sinai taught me how to respectfully disagree, challenge lovingly and reaffirm critically. That is no small feat.

> It answered my questions, and questioned my answers

In the introduction, Plaskow writes, "For me, then, feminism is not about attaining equal rights for women in religious or social structures that remain unchanged, but about the thorough ongoing transformation of religion and society... The project of creating a feminist Judaism fits into a larger project of creating a world in which all women, and all people, have both the basic resources they need to survive, and the opportunity to name and shape the structures of meaning that gave substance to their lives."

Plaskow was the first to see Jewish feminism as a mode of tikkun olam – of making the whole world a better place. Jewish feminism is not a "women's issue" she suggested, but a Jewish issue, and her book put it on the religious and Jewish cultural agenda. Standing Again at Sinai became a reference point for any meaningful dialogue on the subject. Every lecture I have given since 1990 has quoted Plaskow at least once. Standing Again at Sinai is still the benchmark against which authors of Jewish feminist books measure themselves.

Standing Again at Sinai guided me through the early years of Jewish feminism, and helped me find my own voice more clearly. It challenged my assumptions and re-taught me Torah in a way that continually enriches me. It has animated me in my work, in my religious life and in the two books of feminist Torah commentary I have written myself to help women "name and shape the structure of meaning that gives substance to their lives." It has answered my questions, and questioned my answers, and my time-worn copy with personal notes in the margins occupies an honoured place on my bookshelf.

Each book is 'a gem unlike any other'

By YOINE GOLDSTEIN

I inherited my passion for books from my late mother. She used to say: "A buch is nisht nor a buch; yeder buch eez an oitzer." – "a book is not only a book; each book is a treasure." So to try to pick a favourite book, I literally have to go on a treasure hunt.

The books I read as a child were wondrous, filled with images of distant lands, heroics that were not only imaginable, they were feasible, and I could do them! The adventures sprang to life from the page, carrying me with them, making me the hero and sending me off on daydreams as real to me as the weight of the book on my lap.

Each book had its own life. In the modest home of my youth, books were precious. And thanks to the proximity of the public library, possession was easily attainable, but very temporary. Each time I had to return a book, I returned a piece of my heart with it.

That probably explains why, to this day, I am unable to throw books out, no matter how frequently read, no matter how old. Our basement is loaded with books accumulated over a lifetime of reading. Closets, mercifully hidden by doors and packed with books tightly inserted vertically, horizontally and, occasionally, even diagonally, adorn my law office and its various storage areas.

It matters little whether the books have been read recently or long ago, finished in a paroxysm of post-midnight reading or abandoned midstream for lack of interest, time or both. They may be written in English, French, Yiddish or Hebrew – each of these languages has a place in my heart and had a special time in my life.

I remember the first book that was all mine. It was called Yingala Ringala – Little Boy with a Ring. It was a simple child's story with about as much plot as a "Dick and Jane" reader. But it was mine. Not a hand-me-down, previously thumbed, endlessly discussed and dissected or shared tome. This was my very own oitzer – my treasure. I read it over and over, savouring each image and each word. I read it with different emphases. I read it out loud and in silence. I read it in the light of the day and by the light of a flashlight, surreptitiously stored under my pillow. I loved it. For what seems like years.

Then I discovered the stories by Shalom Aleichem, Isaac Leib Peretz and Mendele Moicher Seforim. I read them in Yiddish. I learned from these gifted storytellers that books not only entertain, they also tell about love, about pride, about selfishness, about every human characteristic, positive and negative, because, after all, books are a reflection of humanity and reality.

I remember vicariously sharing the pride of the owner of Mein Nayem Zaiger, a story of a young man who had been given a new watch as a gift and spends the length of the tale contriving in the most imaginative ways to force people to ask him what time it was, so that he could respond that "oif mein nayem zaiger" – "on my new watch, the correct time is… "

I remember books that inspired me to want to become a scientist and find cures for the world's ailments. And books that moved me

The case for the defence: proven beyond a reasonable doubt

By EDDIE GREENSPAN

Exactly one month after my 13th birthday, my father died. Approximately one month after that, I was sitting in our family den, taking a careful look at his library for the first time. I vividly recall removing Irving Stone's biography, Clarence Darrow for the Defence, sitting in my father's favourite chair, leafing through the book and noticing that some passages were underlined by my dad. I can see myself turning to page one and starting to read.

I was up most of the night, and by the next evening, I had read the last page. When I closed the book, and I suspect soon after starting it, I knew what I wanted to do when I grew up.

The book was about an enormous figure in American history, as well as a giant in the courtroom. Clarence Darrow was a legendary criminal lawyer who fought relentlessly against capital punishment. He was a man filled with courage, kindness, charity and infinite pity for the outcast and the weak. He had a warm, sympathetic, merciful and understanding heart. He took the minds and hearts of jurors and judges into the realm of great ideas and high values. Darrow was not afraid to demonstrate the absurdity of laws, to uncover the fallacy of their foundations and to attack their unthinking supporters. He often put the law itself on trial as he did in the famous Scopes "monkey trial," in which a high school teacher in Dayton, Tenn., was charged with teaching Darwin's legally forbidden theory of evolution rather than the creationist theory of the Bible. He often became frustrated with the rigidity of the law and its resistance to change. The "attorney for the damned" had the ability to communicate profound ideas in simple, compelling language and to turn abstractions into imminent realities.

Darrow was a man of action who defended the indefensible, protected the underdog, questioned received "truths," instinctively opposed any exercise of government power and was never willing to sacrifice his own independence of thought. I admired his fierce individualism. He was a debunker and a demystifier who was always skeptical of every element of the case against his clients, who always put the government to the strict proof of its entire case and who never accepted anything at face value. His life was dedicated to his clients, human rights, freedom of expression and liberty. The stakes were always high: his clients were at risk of losing their liberty or their lives.

Darrow understood the need to advance freedom and he had a burning zeal for justice. He had a sense of dedication to the administration of justice. I will never forget reading that as a boy hired to clean up Farmer Brown's potato fields, Darrow said that he "killed bug after bug all that long morning, and then I threw the kerosene can in the general direction of that army of bugs and ran home, declaring through tears that I would never do a lick of work again in my life. And I never have." Work to him was defined as something one did not like to do. He said, "The law is work for some law clerks who ought not to be in it. It isn't work for me; just one fascinating moment after another."

As I put the book in its place on the library shelf, I knew I wanted to be a criminal lawyer. The case for the defence was proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Since that time, I believe I have read everything Darrow has written and everything that has been written about him. I am now 45 years older, but nothing that has happened in my life since that time in my father's library has caused me to doubt for a single moment the path I chose to follow.

Edward Greenspan is a criminal lawyer in Toronto.

A fateful switch from formulas to words

By DAVID HOROVITZ

In my mid-teens, I didn't imagine for a moment that I'd wind up earning my living putting fingers to the keyboard (mind you, even now I only use three or four of them). Under the absurd school system in England, where I was barely educated, you have to choose three subjects at age 16, for what are called "A Level" exams, and drop everything else. I went for mathematics, physics and economics, labouring under the delusion that those were my strengths. My father was an accountant; I think I figured there had to be something in the genes. Only later would I discover that he'd always wanted to be a geography teacher.

Fortunately, while I was garnering pitifully poor grades in my ill-chosen trio of specialist subjects, I got to reading John Le Carre's A Small Town in Germany and The Spy Who Came in from the Cold and Graham Greene's Our Man in Havana. Despite the content, these books did not ignite in me a burning desire to enter the Secret Service. What they did was provoke my admiration. How could anybody write so well, create such compelling characters and such drama, draw me with such authority and dexterity into thoroughly unfamiliar worlds?

I switched from physics to English literature, scraped through my A Levels, went to journalism school and then, after immigrating to Israel, studied English literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. I have yet to publish so much as a sentence of fiction (although it's doubtless critics of some of my journalism would disagree).

But my kids recently went through my old elementary school essay books, delighting in the proliferation of "could do better if he tried harder" comments from my teachers, and came across a story I'd written when I was 10 about a wise African slave and his two pea-brained English explorer-masters. Deep in the jungle, they stumble upon the dismembered corpse of a lion, and the two Brits decide they're going to stitch the pieces together and try to revive the beast. The slave warns them it will eat them if they succeed, but he is ignored and takes prudent refuge up a tree. He's right, of course: the reconstituted lion rewards his restorers by devouring them, and the sorry tale ends with the slave gazing balefully down at the remains of his two former employers and musing about how it is that supposedly well-educated people can be so profoundly stupid.

I make no claims to originality. In fact, I'm fairly certain that I couldn't have come up with so elegant a plot. But reading it with my children for the first time in the 30 years since I scrawled it in my big, crude, slanted pencil-work, I was astounded that I had been capable of writing it at all, and with a simple economy of phrase at that. My physics-misobsessed 16-year-old self would certainly not have thought such a story within its grasp.

But I guess the writing was in there somewhere, and just got buried under the calculus and geometry, the rules of gravity and laws of momentum, the theories of opportunity costs and supply and demand. And I have those most elegant of spy novels to thank for inspiring me to drag it out, for helping me making my blessed escape from the icy finality of numbers to the rich, warm embrace of words.

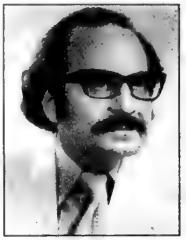
Les livres qui m'ont marqué

NAÏM KATTAN

Dire que la Bible est le livre qui m'a le plus marqué peut paraître, en tant que Juif, comme une banalité. Or, dès mon enfance, avant même que j'apprenne à lire, le Livre m'a accompagné. Car, en effet, il appartient à mon histoire familiale. Ainsi, mon grand-père maternel portait le nom de Joseph et il a appelé deux de ses fils, mes oncles, Ménaché et Ephraïm. Ma mère me racontait, avant de dormir, l'histoire de Joseph, de son père, de ses frères. Aussi, quand j'ai commencé à lire, j'ai retrouvé, dans la Bible, les péripéties de la vie de mon grand-père et de mes oncles.

Plus tard, ce fut le récit de l'exil de mes ancêtres, les prisonniers de Nubuchodnetsar à Babylone, que je déchiffrais. J'étais le descendant des Juifs de la première diaspora, de ceux qui, pour donner une constante vie à la Bible, ont rédigé le Talmud. Je me suis rendu compte que tout écrivain, en prenant conscience de la Bible, apprend, dans l'humilité, que tout ce qu'il inscrira sur le papier ne peut être que commentaire ou éloge du Livre.



Ma langue maternelle étant l'arabe, j'ai lu plus tard, dans le cadre de mes études scolaires, la poésie arabe classique et le Coran, qui reprend, dans une bonne part, l'histoire biblique, d'Abraham à Salomon. J'ai découvert, en même temps, les Mille et une nuits, histoires qui, en plus de nourrir mon imagination ont marqué mon rapport avec le réel. Très tôt, le monde m'est apparu comme un ensemble d'histoires, chaque personne ayant la sienne que l'écrivain transcrit et transmet.

Ma vie d'écrivain ayant débuté à Bagdad, ma langue d'expression était l'arabe et les premiers auteurs qui furent des modèles se nommaient Gibran Khalil Gibran, Tewfik el Hakim, Taha Hussein qui chacun, à sa manière, ouvrait pour moi les portes de l'Occident. Je fréquentais l'école de l'Alliance Israélite Universelle où l'enseignement était dispensé en quatre langues : l'arabe, le français, l'anglais et l'hébreu. La bibliothèque de l'école fut, pour moi, une source vitale. Dès que j'ai commencé à lire en français, les livres qui m'impressionnaient étaient ceux d'André Malraux, André Gide, Romain Rolland. En même temps, je m'initiais en anglais aux pièces de Shakespeare, œuvres que je ne me lasse pas de relire. Dans toutes ces pages, l'Occident vivait. Je n'avais qu'une hâte: atteindre ses rivages.

En 1941, alors que je venais d'avoir treize ans, un gouvernement pro-nazi prit le pouvoir en Irak et déclara la guerre à la Grande-Bretagne. À la suite de sa défaite, Bagdad demeura, pendant trois jours, sans autorités et des hordes attaquèrent le quartier juif. Le Farhoud est le nom donné à ce pogrom qui traumatisa la communauté juive, vieille de vingt-cinq siècles.

En 1947, j'ai eu la chance d'obtenir une bourse du gouvernement français pour poursuivre mes études à la Sorbonne. À Paris, les livres se mêlaient à la vie. J'ai fait partie du groupe surréaliste et j'ai commencé à écrire en français. En 1954, j'ai décidé d'émigrer au Canada et de m'installer à Montréal, la ville française de l'Amérique. C'est alors que j'ai pris la décision de changer de langue, de passer de l'arabe au français. Tout en parcourant le Canada et les Etats-Unis, je me suis employé à lire l'Amérique dans les pages de ses poètes et de ses romanciers. J'ai pris connaissance du Québec dans les textes de Gabrielle Roy, Roger Lemelin, Saint-Denis Garneau, Anne Hébert.

Deux écrivains ont particulièrement marqué mon itinéraire, une quête qui, sans m'éloigner de mon judaïsme, me liait à une Amérique que je vivais au jour le jour : un Canadien, A. M. Klein et un Américain né à Montréal, Saul Bellow. Dans une collection destinée à la jeunesse, j'ai consacré un ouvrage à Klein. J'ai suivi son cheminement, son engagement dans la vie de son pays qui, loin de l'enfermer, l'incitait à partir à la découverte du monde. J'ai accompagné, dans Le Second Rouleau (The Second Scroll), un Juif de Montréal, un Juif de tous les continents.

L'Amérique est le continent de Saul Bellow. J'ai suivi son œuvre, fus imprégné par sa soif de vivre et de comprendre.

Lors de mes années d'études à Paris, j'ai eu l'occasion de lire Marcel Proust. Je le trouvais alors trop précis dans ses descriptions et ses analyses d'une société décadente, en voie de disparition, alors que j'étais assoiffé d'action et débordant d'énergie. Bien plus tard, il y a quelques années, je l'ai relu. C'est alors dans la joie que j'ai savouré les délices de ses longues phrases, ses pénétrantes évocations des mouvements de la passion, de l'amour, de l'ambition et de l'art. Une lecture de la maturité.

Naïm Kattan est un écrivain illustre qui a été le récipiendaire de plusieurs prix littéraires. Il demeure à Montréal.

Critical thinking in a complex world

By MOSHE KAVEH

When my sister and I were young, our father, Rabbi David Kaveh, used to regale us with stories of the pitched battles in Europe between chassidic and Lithuanian Jews.

Jews of every type were engaged in ideological-religious battles. One group swore by a certain master and his holy writings. The next group advocated with equal passion another holy master and his texts, while negating all others. My sister and I loved the battles and characters in these stories and all the fables associated with them.

That world has passed us by. Few live their lives by the dictates of a single individual or by the proscriptions of any one book – not even the Bible. Today, we live in a world where nothing is absolute. Everything is relative, and everything is subject to critical inquiry and scientific standards of proof.

Judaism, too, has evolved into a vast supermarket of ideas – with streams, sub-streams and sub-sub-streams of thought and theology to choose from.

Thus, when coming to write about "the book" that most influenced my life, I discover, lo and behold, that there is no such thing! Life and religion are too complicated to be pigeonholed into one book, no matter how wise its contents.

My training as a scientist, perhaps, has ruined me: I am very critical. Every hypothesis, every argument, every approach or proscribed path, has weaknesses. I am constantly searching for absolutes. No one outlook satisfies me; I need to taste a little morsel of one worldview, while at the same time – or at other times – adopting bits of another.

Modern physics emphasizes the "uncertainty principle" – a metaphor, perhaps, for our intellectual world. My personal specialty in physics is "disordered systems." No wonder, then, that I relish complexity, variety and the unknown! Indeed, as a scientist, I know that the question is often more important and significant than any answer or group of answers.

In any case, the result of all this is that I have been drawn to differing, even contradictory, rivulets of thought – and the canonic texts of these rivers – at different times in my life.

Many years ago in my college days, Yeshayahu Leibowitz's Torah and Mitzvot in These Times (Tel Aviv, 1954) captivated me. I even tried to conduct myself along the lines of religious thinking and practice outlined in this outstanding, maverick and controversial work of theology.

Leibowitz viewed the world, and God, in the coldest of eyes. Judaism meant absolute obedience to God's wishes and dictates, without any necessary reward. God's transcendence meant that He was unreachable and could not be "corrupted" by our petty pleadings. For Leibowitz, the dividing line between Divine "values" and human "needs" was absolute; its breach was heretical. "Don't ask what God can do for you," Leibowitz seemed to be saying. "Ask what you can do in obedient submissiveness to God."

For a while, Leibowitz's totalitarian approach to Judaism was attractive, because the absolutism of it all washed away any heavy questions of faith. Dilemmas of faith simply had no place or relevance.

However, as time passed, I found this approach untenable. Leibowitz's weltanschauung left no room for Providence or emotional attachment, allowed no meaning to history, and flew in the face of generations of Jewish worship and custom.

Here entered my life the writings of the giant of philosophy and Halachah, the late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. In Halachic Man (Philadelphia: JPS, 1983, translation by Lawrence Kaplan, originally published as Ish ha-Halacha in Talpioth 1, 1944), Rabbi Soloveitchik opened great vistas for human creativity and partnership with God in the ongoing creation of the world. In so doing, he ascribed significant religious meaning to my scientific pursuits.

Rabbi Soloveitchik stressed the power of man to experience the world on multiple planes and in existential moods, even with religious passion and a degree of mysticism. He lent religious and historical meaning to the covenantal community and to the rise of the State of Israel; and provided a

The Bible and Rashbam's biblical commentary: no other books come close

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Of course it's the Bible! No other book has had more of an influence on my life. No other book even comes close.

I am forever grateful to the old-fashioned teachers I had when I was young who actually made me memorize large chunks of biblical texts. (Back then, I was not so grateful, but that's another story.) There is no book I can quote – usually accurately – as well as I can quote the Bible. There is no book that has enriched my knowledge of Hebrew more than the Bible. There is no book that has influenced my lifestyle more than the Bible. There is no book that has inspired me, chastised me, uplifted me or challenged me more than the Bible. And to be perfectly honest, there is no book that has troubled me more than the Bible. Every book that I have ever read has passages in it that have irritated me or disappointed me. Generally, I can just laugh them off or at least shrug them off. But I can't do that with the Bible.

At a relatively young age, I learned that the Bible may be read in a number of extremely different, mutually exclusive ways. The way the traditional Jew reads the Bible has almost nothing in common with the way that a secular scholar might teach the book in a university. I was a Bible major at Hebrew University in Jerusalem 32 years ago, and then I decided to transfer to a yeshiva. One of my friends at the (relatively modern) yeshiva to which I transferred told me when I came: "We study a book called the Bible here at this yeshiva, too. You might think that it is the same book that you studied at the university. It isn't." The book might have had the same words, the same verses and the same chapters, but he was right: it wasn't the same book.

This brings me to the third book, namely Rabbi Soloveitchik's Fate and Destiny: From the Holocaust to the State of Israel (Hoboken, N.J.: Ktav), 2000. I read it a couple of years ago in its original Hebrew version, which has a much more expressive name – "Kol Dodi Dofek" ("the voice of my lover is knocking on the door"). Kol Dodi Dofek is a quote from the Song of Songs depicting the lost opportunity of the beloved who did not open the door in time to let her waiting lover enter.

This is a beautiful metaphor for the situation of the Jewish people, which is characterized by both far-reaching opportunities and dangers provided by fate with "permission given" to make choices that will weave the future to realize opportunity or succumb to dangers. To move to the terminology of Niccolo Machiavelli, "fortune" provides us with "occasions," the correct or incorrect use or neglect of which depends on our "virtue."

On May 14, the Jewish Agency announced the establishment of the Institute for Jewish People Policy Planning, with former U.S. envoy to the Middle East Dennis Ross as chair of the board of directors, Avinoam Bar-Yosef as director-general and myself as founding president. As far as self-analysis can be relied upon, my part in bringing about the establishment of this Jewish people think tank is in large part due to the impact of these three books on me.

Yehezkel Dror is a scholar and philosopher in Jerusalem.

Thirty years ago, I was searching for a reading method for the book that I knew was central to my life. To be honest, I found most of the methodologies I encountered for reading the Bible unsatisfying. The university method seemed too cold and distant to me. I felt that many of the proponents of the modern critical method of reading the Bible felt themselves superior to the allegedly primitive biblical authors. I wasn't sure they were right.

Then again, the traditionalist reading of the Bible also left me unsatisfied. It seemed to me that the authority of tradition was forcing me to read verses in specific ways, even when I felt that that was not what the words were saying. I had been taught the proper tools for close reading of any text by good teachers. Why should I give up my right to my reading, I asked myself, just because previous generations of Jews had read the Bible in a different way? In summary, I found that reading methods of the Bible were either insufficiently deferential or overly deferential to tradition.

Then I discovered the one book that really changed my intellectual, religious and scholarly life: the Torah commentary of Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam [Rashi's grandson], 12th-century northern France). It's almost too generous to call his work a book, since it is just a list of disjointed comments. It is very dry, rarely exciting and has very few spiritually uplifting passages. It was written by an exceptional but cantankerous rabbi, who was convinced of his own brilliance and who often told his readers that if they wanted to understand some verses, they should be sure to read his commentary, "since those [Bible commentators] who preceded me did not understand these verses at all" (commentary to Exodus 3:11).

> 'Rashbam teaches traditional Jews like me that it is acceptable – and perhaps even desirable – to read the text closely and respect our own readings'

Why did this not very popular biblical commentary change my life? Because it was written by a very devout old-fashioned rabbi who promulgated biblical readings that appeared right to him even when they conflicted with thousands of years of reading traditions.

For example, in the first chapter of the Bible we find a series of phrases: "There was evening and there was morning, one day... there was evening and there was morning, the second day." Like anyone with a solid Jewish education, I had been taught that these verses were the source for the Jewish law that "day follows night" – that is, that the Jewish day begins in the evening and then finishes the following evening. An essential principle of Jewish law, hallowed by tradition, this phrase is cited as the source for the way we celebrate the Sabbath and other holidays.

As far as I can tell, every loyal Jew until the 12th century read the verses that way. Every Jew, that is, until Rashbam, who came along and said that that is not what the words mean. The context of the biblical verse is: God created X; after creating X, there was evening (that is, it got dark) and then there was morning (that is, dawn broke), "one day" – that is, that was the end of one day, at dawn. The days of creation finished in the morning, not in the evening.

Rashbam's commentary abounds with such daring, innovative comments as this that show an independent, creative mind. He had been taught the traditional readings of biblical verses from his earliest youth. But he overcame his training and took a fresh look at the words and came up with what look like revolutionary readings.

Rashbam, though, was far from a revolutionary. He was a legal arch-conservative, full of respect for the biblical text and for traditional Jewish law. The Sabbath he observed certainly began at sunset.

Rashbam taught me, and still teaches me as I continue to plumb his writings, that it is possible to defer to Jewish tradition in many matters and yet be autonomous in reading. Rashbam teaches traditional Jews like me that it is acceptable – and perhaps even desirable – to read the text closely and respect our own readings. He teaches us that interpretive autonomy is compatible with religious heteronomy – with deferring to tradition in matters of practice. More than any other book, Rashbam's Torah commentary teaches me to be a modern traditional Jew.

Martin Lockshin is the director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. He is the author of three volumes of annotated translations of Rashbam's Torah commentary, and is currently writing the fourth and final volume.

The books that brought us together

By B. GLEN ROTCHIN

Which books have influenced you? I can hardly think of a more intrusive question. There's an intimacy one develops with a book. It touches and remains with you like nothing else. We never speak of influential books in the past tense; they are strangely resistant to nostalgia. They don't mark an occasion or an era like a favourite song. Influential books are a different species altogether. They live along with you, change as you change, endure. They are as unique, cherished and indispensable as members of your own family.

Three books immediately come to mind, one volume of poetry and two novels. All entered my life at about the same time as my wife of 10 years, Annetta Black. The books that have influenced me most are connected to the person that continues to influence me most.

The first is Love Poems by the Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai. I discovered Amichai while working at the Jewish Public Library in the late 1980s. I was a reader of poetry and dabbled in the craft myself, but was becoming increasingly disillusioned with the poetry I'd seen in recent volumes and little magazines. Those poems tended to be dispassionate, highly intellectualized experiments in form and language.

But Amichai's work stunned me. His style was unadorned and jarring in an unromantic, accessible way. And he had the chutzpah to write about love and God and war, subjects no contemporary poet dared touch for fear of sounding clichéd.

Amichai's work restored my faith in the power of poetry, and revived my thirst for verse. The astonishing thing about his voice is that it is as forceful and relevant today as ever, even though the poet himself is no longer with us. In the current climate of anguish and terror that plagues the Middle East and the world, there is not a poet alive who can express our sense of fear and vulnerability the way Amichai did in his poem God Has Mercy on Kindergarten Children: "God has mercy on kindergarten children./ He has less pity on school children./ And on grownups he has no pity at all,/ he leaves them alone./ and sometimes they must crawl on all fours/ in the burning sand/ to reach the first-aid station/ covered in blood."

Later, as we joined our lives in a single home, Annetta and I mixed our personal libraries. My copy of Love Poems and her bilingual hardcover edition of Shirei Ahavah, purchased in Jerusalem when she lived there years earlier, met on the shelf where they still stand today, side by side.

The second book is A.M. Klein's classic The Second Scroll. It was given to me by Annetta shortly after we began dating, with her assurance that it was the most important novel she'd ever read. Arguably, the greatest Jewish novel of the 20th century, as grand in theme as it is profound in execution and impact, it was a revelation to me as well.

The story of a young Montreal journalist's search for his uncle Melech Davidson re-enacts the biblical journey of the Israelites through the wilderness to the Promised Land. But this time, the wilderness is the carnage and trauma of the past 100 years, and the Promised Land is the founding of the State of Israel. Here we have an individual spiritual sojourn wrapped around a collective historical quest. It is an ambitiously structured literary labyrinth, comprising a poem, a letter and a play folded inside a fast-paced mystery novel. It was a masterpiece of post-modern experimentation long before anyone had ever heard of the term post-modernism.

Beyond its linguistic virtuosity, The Second Scroll is, at its heart, a Canadian Jew's personal search for meaning in the post-Holocaust era. It's absolutely required reading for any thinking, caring Jew, and helped me grasp the rich spiritual sources of my own Jewish identity.

The third book is a Hebrew novel by the pre-war Austrian writer David Vogel, or is it Fogel? It influenced my life immeasurably even though I've never read it. A little over a decade ago, Annetta was researching a thesis on Fogel for her masters degree in Jewish studies at McGill University. She was having difficulty locating the English translation of his book at the university and decided to try the Jewish Public Library where I was working. She had consulted the card catalogue without luck and came to see me.

Claire Stern, the JPL's head of public services, suggested that perhaps it was not "Fogel" but "Vogel" spelled in the German way but pronounced differently. Claire was right. The book was found in the library's collection and Annetta and I discovered each other in turn..The title of the Vogel novel that brought us together? Married Life.

Glen Rotchin is a Montreal poet and co-editor with Seymour Mayne of two anthologies, Jerusalem: An Anthology of Jewish Canadian Poetry, and A Rich Garland: Poems For A.M. Klein, both published by Véhicule Press.

A vote for Rambam's Guide of the Perplexed

By RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM

When surrounded by books, it is difficult to single out one as the most influential in my life – difficult, but not impossible. We turn to books for knowledge, for understanding, for comfort, for encouragement, for laughter, for tears. As much as I value and enjoy the age of the computer and electronic publications, the printed, hard-copy text, which can be read at leisure on a Shabbat or Yom Tov afternoon, remains one of the timeless pleasures of life.

My first reaction was to turn to the works of Elie Wiesel that inspired me greatly in my teenage and early adult years. From Night to The Jews of Silence, from A Generation After to Dawn, Wiesel's works led so many of my generation to understand that taking our heritage and traditions seriously gives a purpose and direction to survival in a turbulent world. Having had the privilege of meeting Wiesel several times over the years, I have been most struck by his humility. Thus, I know that he would not be offended by my choice of a different author as the writer who has most influenced me in my lifetime.

The writer whose works have had most impact on my life did his best work some 900 years ago. Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon, Moses Maimonides, whose writings I had the privilege of studying intensely some 30 years ago, is still in print today. His works still sell, even his medical texts – not at the best-seller level perhaps, but at a level sufficient to keep them in print.

My studies at McGill University with Prof. Ze'ev Harvey (now of Hebrew University) focused on Rambam's Moreh Nevuchim (Guide of the Perplexed), a difficult, uninviting text on the best of days. In part, we read the text in the original Arabic, other times, mercifully, we plowed through Shlomo Pines' English translation. As we studied, it was clear to me that no major studio would be bidding for the movie rights – that this was not a work that would inspire the masses.

Why, then, would I consider Rambam's Guide as the work that most influenced me? Perhaps, because I realized, at a time of personal spiritual uncertainty, that Maimonides offered his reader a vision of the world and Torah that made a great deal of sense.

The Guide of the Perplexed, in essence, is a letter – a very long letter – written to a student named Joseph ben Yehudah. His student has written the master, seeking a curriculum of study to become more knowledgeable in the ways of Torah. Joseph seems to be caught in the struggle between traditional and secular studies. He has a yen for science and mathematics and wants to pursue that learning, but not at the expense of Torah.

Maimonides encourages his student to pursue his "secular" studies. The implication is clear – only through knowledge of the universe (science), through an appreciation of the complexities of creation, can one come to appreciate the magnificence and awesome power of the Creator. Study science, then come back and study Torah, was the message. In the several hundreds of difficult pages that follow, Rambam offers interpretation of biblical verses, and difficult passages, that, in short, uphold the rational nature of Torah.

The modern world so often wants to suggest to us that religion is a product of a bygone age, that we have surpassed the knowledge of the ancients, that Mishnah and midrash in the age of the microprocessor are anachronistic and irrelevant. Maimonides, however, sets us straight. Here, this outstanding physician, this great scientist, this master of so many fields, this giant of Halachah and philosophy, puts us in our place.

Science, technology, the basis of our modern world, he teaches, are not in conflict with Torah and tradition. On the contrary, properly appreciated, they necessitate belief in the Creator, because, without God, how could there be something as miraculously complex as the human body, something as magnificent as the natural wonders of the universe? So, we are told, first learn science and mathematics to appreciate the world and realize that the world must have emanated from a Creator – then, spend your time learning what God wants of us by studying Torah and mastering traditional text.

That Jewish philosophy seminar at McGill almost 30 years ago led me to rethink several personal assumptions. It also influenced my personal practices and, ultimately, my career direction. I have never looked back.

In this age of confusion and uncertainty, a Guide of the Perplexed is essential, and none will be found that will equal in timeless importance the works of Moses Maimonides. Understand that this book is no "Jewish Philosophy for Dummies." It is lengthy, difficult, and, to be honest, rather boring. But struggling through its pages, without question, is worth every minute, because through its pages, the Rambam in his brilliance leads us to better appreciate the world in which we live and the Torah that distinguishes us.

An 'intoxicating revelation'

By BERNARD SHAPIRO

No book is ever experienced in a vacuum, since it is always reflected through the prism of the language, the culture and the education of the reader – to say nothing of his or her more general life experience and his or her previous reading.

I first read Mordecai Kaplan's Judaism as a Civilization in 1950, some 16 years after its publication and some 30 years after Kaplan's 1920 seminal article A Program for the Reconstruction of Judaism, which appeared in the Menorah Journal.

I came across the book almost accidentally while browsing in the library of the Shaar Hashomayim synagogue in Montreal. I cannot, even now, say what it was that attracted me to it. I only know that I started to leaf through it, found myself more than a little startled – someone from the Jewish Theological Seminary had this radical disbelief in a transcendental God! – and I immediately decided to borrow it so as to read it more carefully.

I was 15 years old at the time, and what I considered careful reading would not, in fact, have met serious adult standards. Moreover, outside of the standard texts of a limited and very traditional Jewish education, I had never read an adult book on religion. Somehow, however, this did not deter me. I was self-centred enough to be satisfied with my own standards, and admittedly on this somewhat fragile foundation, I found Judaism as a Civilization an intoxicating revelation.

Now, a half-century later, it is hard to recall just why the book had this profound – and as it turned out a lasting – effect. It is the joy and the intoxication that I really recall. In retrospect, however, I believe my response arose from a sudden realization that Kaplan was the first to make clear to me that there were many things which I assumed to be "givens" – that is, necessary and immutable aspects of my religion, my life and my society – but which could, in fact, be better understood as a matter of "choice" – in the case of religion, a choice either for an individual Jew and/or for Jews as a group.

I had always known that there were differences among Jews, that there were differences in belief and in practice among chassidic, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews and their congregations, "shuls" or "shtieblach." Unthinkingly, however, I simply believed that as a Jew, one was "born into" one or other of these groups and aside from outright apostasy and rejection of Judaism altogether, one was somehow "bound" to that group for life. Certainly, I had not observed within any one of the many Jewish communities in Montreal any particular interest in the religious ideas and/or commitments of the others.

For me, Kaplan permanently changed this framework of religious misunderstanding. I began to understand that religious understanding and religious practice had changed over time, in response not only to internal inspiration but also to the external environment. I began to imagine that in all probability, changes would continue to occur if only to enable individuals to express and commit themselves religiously in terms meaningful to them. Most importantly, although there might now be greater focus on deliberate and individual choice, there was also, in Kaplan's vision, an understanding of the social nature of men and women and, therefore, a continuous quest to find a difficult but vital middle ground between a radical and essentially anti-social individualism and an equally radical and necessarily authoritarian submission to the general will.

Judaism as a Civilization an 'intoxicating revelation'

In terms of my religious understanding, the experience of Kaplan's book opened entirely new vistas, so many new ways in which I could act out my own desire to live a committed Jewish life. I cannot claim that I always found Kaplan's own ideas of Jewish life compelling, but they always provided me with an impetus for religious reflection, out of which my own choices and my own commitments eventually matured.

It was not, however, just a matter of religion. In one area of my life after another I found that as a result of reading Judaism as a Civilization, I was now better attuned to history and the value of knowledge of the past as a stronger foundation upon which to creatively manage the present and build for our common future. I was now more aware of the need to balance the commitment to liberty and free will with what Tzvetan Todorov refers to as "sociability," not only for "... the purposes of nourishment and reproduction, but also for becoming conscious and speaking beings." Finally, I felt empowered – life was not only something that happened to you; it was, at least some of the time, something that you made happen.

Was there something inherent in Judaism as a Civilization that produced this response or was it just that I picked it up at a time when, for other reasons, I was ready for it? In all likelihood, it was both, and, therefore, for those who have not read it, you might want to consider if this is the moment for you.

Bernard Shapiro is the principal and vice-chancellor of McGill University.

to tears. Books that taught me about the beauty of nature, about the perfection of some parts of reality and the imperfections of most of it. Books that made me laugh uproariously, and books that brought sadness and hopelessness. Books that caused me to think I could reach the stars, and books that made me despair for the future of mankind.

Through almost a dozen years of university, I was altered by several books and by the professors who brought them to my attention.

I remember one law teacher, a francophone teaching in English, who insisted that the Civil Code, a book, should be treated like a mistress: sitting on our knees and held close to our hearts. Another, a Marxist-Leninist political scientist who stuttered during classes (but who was still by far the most dynamic lecturer I ever had), forced me to question the value of most books. His commentary on a book review that I had submitted was a devastating "At night all cats are black," meaning that I had not succeeded in differentiating this book from any other. I no longer remember which book that was, but he had made it different for me, and from that day onward, I have treated every book as a gem unlike any other.

Then there are the books that indelibly marked my soul. I remember devouring an anthology, The Poetry of Freedom, at a time when I was enthralled with left wingers such as Pete Seeger who revived ballads to make them the passionate harbingers of a new order. Much of the poetry was liberating; it allowed me to imagine a different world in whose centre I might yet be permitted to live.

Above all, books permitted me to persist in dreaming, both for myself and others.

When I was a child I imagined myself controlling the unfolding narrative of each story that I read. I was the hero. I, too, could do whatever the book's champion could do. By the time I was in college, I had learned the luxury of permitting each story, each theory, each poem to control me by allowing it to teach me.

Now I look back on the many favourite books of my life with nostalgia. They still have the power they had when I first read them, the power to evoke the happiness, the imagery and the freedom of Yingala Ringala – the little boy with a ring that I once was.

Critical thinking in a complex world framework for navigating the spiritual conflicts between Jews and Christians in the modern world.

Most of all, Rabbi Soloveitchik helped me understand that man and his worldview are never static, that struggle is heroic, and that the forward-backward dance of withdrawal and conquest is noble and leads to spiritual growth.

And thus today, I am both a Chassid and a Lithuanian mitnaged. Both a scientist and a believer. An admirer of Leibowitz-ian stoicism and of Rabbi Soloveitchik's passionate existentialism. A mystic and a hard-nosed realist. I am optimistic and pessimistic about Israeli life and global Jewish continuity. I know that no one book, or approach has all the answers.

The Torah's greatest influence: the Book of Psalms

By RABBI MOSHE STERN

Of all the books of our holy Torah, except for the Five Books of Moses, the Book of Psalms (Tehillim) has had the greatest influence on me, personally, and on the development of the Jewish spirit generally.

The psalms, which take as their basis truths taught in the Torah, sing of HaShem's workings both in nature and in the destiny of Israel, of man and of the nations. The psalms impart to us the spiritual life of a nation that bases itself on the commands and provisions set forth in the Torah. Under the benevolent eye of HaShem and directed and instructed through His providence, both man and nation strive to an evermore perfect fulfilment of their destiny and goal in life.

Tehillim manifests the expression and yearning of emotions that fill the heart of man as he walks through the vicissitudes of life. Reading Tehillim is an enobling and enriching experience that nourishes our souls and elevates our spirits.

In times of suffering and sorrow, as we are currently experiencing in our community in Toronto and in the land of Israel – indeed, as Jews are experiencing everywhere – the Book of Psalms offers gentle solace to our troubled hearts.

Before the book is opened, we stand alone, overwhelmed by misfortune. All avenues of escape appear to be closed. But upon entering the eternal words of Tehillim, the Psalmist says in the best known of all his verses: "Though I walk in the valley overshadowed by death, I will fear no evil, for Your rod and Your staff, they comfort me (Psalm 23:4)." A rod is something that causes pain and affliction. Seen on its own, it is rather frightening. However, as we come to understand and realize that the "rod of punishment" is also a "staff" that provides protection, support and aid, a sense of comfort and courage envelops us.

The Radak (Rabbi David Kimchi 1160-1235) explains that King David, author of most of the psalms, knew this well. As a shepherd, he used one stick for two purposes: as a "rod" to get the sheep to their place and to strike out harmful creatures, and as a "staff" upon which to lean his weary body. Thus, says the Radak, the rod symbolizes pain and suffering and the staff represents redemption and salvation. We can see from this merger of concepts that HaShem balances pain with salvation, bringing comfort to us.

The Midrash Shochor Tov mentions that King David prayed to HaShem, "Let the one who says Tehillim be worthy in your eyes as if one would have learned the laws of Negaim [laws concerning spots on the skin] and Oholot [laws concerning impurities under a roof]."

The Ksav Sofer (Rabbi Shmuel Binyamin Sofer, 1815-1872) explained, "Why especially these two laws? The halachah of negaim [leprosy] is that only a kohen can decide whether or not it is pure or impure. Even if the kohen is uneducated and he must ask a scholar for advice, only the kohen can pronounce 'pure' or 'impure.' From this we learn that even if a kohen does not know the Halachah, his words have the power to make someone pure or impure."

King David prayed for a similar effect, continued the Ksav Sofer: "Even if the person saying Tehillim does not understand the meaning of the words, let his words have the power of the kohen and accomplish what they were meant to do."

There are 150 chapters in all printed editions of Tehillim. In Magechet Sofrim, however, we find there that there are only 147. The Minchas Chai points out that the Talmud (Berachot 9B) considers the first two chapters as one. The Radak considers Chapter 115 as part of Chapter 114 and 117

Subsequent to my discovery of and attraction to the Gideon approach, I was to read Oswald Spengler's Decline of the West and then the refutation of metaphysics by 20th-century philosophers. But Gideon revealed to me the satisfaction of developing an internally consistent theory, even if it could not ultimately be externally consistent or unique.

5. Philosophical Investigations by Ludwig Wittgenstein.

Wittgenstein is to philosophy what Masaccio is to art and architecture or what Louis Pasteur is to science – someone whose vision changed a field of endeavour forever. For someone entranced by the sound and etymology of language, by its power and musicality, it was a revelation to have yet another aspect unfold – that of the discipline of meaning.

6. Systems of Survival by Jane Jacobs.

The novelty and simplicity of Jacobs' explanation of social behaviour and motivation in Systems of Survival is breathtaking. It is a book that leaves one with that wonderful "aha" feeling: aha, that's how it works. Her division of the world into traders (employing mercantile behaviour) and guardians (those entrusted with the public good) gives an extraordinarily coherent understanding of society. The confusion conservative governments make of these roles – the precept that government should be run like a business – has lead to a diminution of the public realm. The dilution of the guardian role among professionals, such as accounting professionals who acted as traders and not as guardians, has led in some measure to the current economic debacle in the stock market.

7. Pablo Neruda and Roy Campbell.

Neruda and Campbell are two poets who perhaps have not influenced me but who represent to me the deep pleasure the language of poetry can provide: Neruda, for the language of romance, sensuality and pain; Campbell, for the exhilaration of word combinations and the powerful imagery these invoke.

"The recitation of Psalms can help us"

as a continuation of 16, which brings the total to 147.

The Kisei Rachamim suggests that this particular number was chosen to correspond with the years of life of our patriarch Jacob. This is because Jacob, in a prophetic-mystical way, recited psalms while watching Laban's flock throughout the night. To be sure, nighttime is a metaphor for exile. Jacob is the one who begged HaShem to reveal the End of Days (see Rashi at the beginning of Parshat Vayechi — Genesis 47:28). Jacob is the one who pleaded with HaShem for peace and tranquillity.

In our times, we are living through dramatic and traumatic events. The world is in an upheaval, and to survive these trying times, we steady ourselves with faith and trust. Israel is the focal point of the entire world. As Reb Nachman of Breslov said, "Jerusalem is the eye of the universe." The recitation of Psalms can help us through both personal and collective trauma and unite us with fellow Jews the world over.

Rabbi Aryeh Levin of Jerusalem, a man of rare compassion and sensitivity, attempted to comfort a recently widowed woman who came to his home crying uncontrollably. All of his efforts to console the distraught widow were fruitless, until she said, "Rabbi, I will accept your words of consolation on one condition: Please tell me what happened to all of my tears. I prayed and prayed for my late husband, I recited chapter after chapter of Tehillim, and shed thousands of tears. My very soul flowed into those tears. Were they all wasted?"

Gently, Rav Aryeh replied, "After 120 years, when you leave this world and ascend to the heavenly tribunal, you will see how meaningful and precious your tears were. You will discover that God himself gathered up and counted every single teardrop, treasuring it like a priceless gem. And you will discover that whenever some harsh decree was looming over the Jewish people, one of your tears came and washed it away, nullifying it completely. One sincere tear is a source of salvation in the world!"

Upon hearing this, the woman burst into a fresh flow of tears – not tears of grief, but tears of courage and hope.

So there it is, the Book of Psalms, the book that has profoundly affected me in many ways. It is a book that can affect any reader whose heart is open and whose spirit yearns for elevation. I pray that you too can be similarly moved and uplifted by its holy words.

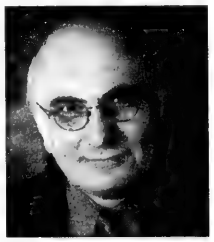
Ces lectures qui nous habitent

By VICTOR TEBOUL

Lire est toujours associé chez moi au plaisir des sens. Je me souviendrai toujours de mon professeur d'arabe qui n'ouvrait jamais un livre sans en contempler d'abord la couverture; il tournait ensuite la première page et semblait la caresser lorsqu'il l'aplanissait de sa main en s'apprêtant à nous la lire à haute voix. Il nous communiquait, par son geste, la jouissance que lui avait procurée le livre avant même de commencer sa lecture. "Une personne seule dans une chambre paraît toujours étrange, ce qui n'est pas le cas si elle est absorbée à lire", aimait-il nous dire.

Je comprenais que le livre était un excellent compagnon dans la solitude. Grâce à ce professeur de langue arabe, je reconnais très vite aujourd'hui ceux et celles qui ont une véritable affection pour les livres; c'est dans leur façon de les toucher qu'ils se révèlent à moi.



Plus tard, lors de mes études de journalisme, mon professeur de lettres était si passionné de littérature qu'il me mettait l'eau à la bouche lorsqu'il nous lisait certains extraits des œuvres au programme. En l'écoutant, j'avais envie de croquer ces mots qui se roulaient entre ses dents comme des fruits succulents. Comment, en plus, pouvais-je résister lorsqu'un des ouvrages dont il nous parlait sans cesse avait pour titre Les Nourritures terrestres? C'est grâce à lui que je découvrais André Gide et Albert Camus, et la sensualité toute méditerranéenne dont est imprégné L'Étranger. Je me souviens de ce professeur interrompant sa lecture pour que nous puissions savourer avec lui la sonorité de telle ou telle expression. "Écoutez! Écoutez!", répétait-il en détachant lentement les sons des mots. "Aurore" était, pour lui, le plus beau mot de la langue française, car il résonnait d'images et de sons. Je n'oublierai jamais le professeur Guy Boulizon.

Il y a des livres qui arrivent dans notre vie sans que nous sachions pourquoi. Mais, comme on le sait, les coïncidences ne sont jamais tout à fait fortuites.

C'est dans un souk, à Tunis, que j'ai acheté mon premier livre: Le Journal d'Anne Frank. J'avais douze ans, nous arrivions, mes parents et moi, de Marseille, d'où nous avions été refoulés, n'ayant pas le visa d'entrée exigé par les autorités françaises. J'avais très certainement déjà entendu parler de ce livre pour qu'il ait si bien retenu mon attention. Je m'associais sans doute aux thèmes très connus de l'histoire: fuite, refuge, guerre, persécution. N'étions-nous pas des réfugiés, expulsés d'Égypte? Étant à court de ressources, nous venions même de nous présenter aux bureaux tunisiens de la HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society), l'organisme qui devait assurer les frais du voyage pour notre retour en France. J'avais de bonnes raisons sans doute de m'identifier à Anne Frank.

Après que mes parents eurent obtenu le visa pour la France, je me souviens que, sur le pont du navire en route pour Marseille, j'étais assis sur une chaise longue, emmitouflé dans une couverture, et que j'avais lu d'une traite ce "livre de poche". À notre arrivée, j'avais mal aux doigts de l'avoir serré si fort durant la traversée.

J'écrivais moi-même mon propre journal, ayant commencé sa rédaction lors des événements de Suez, et je découvrais d'étranges coïncidences avec cet ouvrage. Comme Anne Frank, j'avais éprouvé, dès les premières pages, le besoin d'expliquer qui j'étais avant d'entreprendre la description des événements du premier jour. Je reconnaissais, à la lecture de ce livre, la force de l'écriture. Non pas celle qui vous permet de vous survivre, comme on dit, ou de toucher la corde sensible de votre lecteur, mais celle, plus simple, plus terre à terre, de vous accompagner au cours d'une vie. Cela me fascinait qu'Anne Frank ait pu donner un prénom à son journal et qu'elle lui adressât la parole comme à une amie. Elle décrivait les événements de la journée en commençant par "Chère Kitty" et finissait par "À toi, Anne".

"Le papier est patient" écrira-t-elle à quelques reprises. Comme si l'écriture absorbait ses peines et la libérait en

The Zionist Idea: A rich storehouse of thoughts that still resonate

By GIL TROY

I first read Arthur Hertzberg's The Zionist Idea: A Historical Analysis and Reader when I was in high school. In truth, I did not read all 638 pages of this anthology of key Zionist writings cover to cover, then or ever. This is a book to be sampled and savoured. I am now on my second well-thumbed copy, for the book opened my eyes to a rich ideological universe that debated the essential tensions between Judaism and the modern world.

The book begins with a nearly 100 page introduction covering the history of early Zionism. I have read that authoritative overview repeatedly over the years. The introduction is followed by excerpts from the writings of nearly 40 Zionist thinkers, all of whom were born before 1900. So many different Zionisms, and so many different Judaisms, come to life in the book: Theodor Herzl's political Zionism and Ahad Ha'am's cultural Zionism, Nahum Syrkin's socialist Zionism and A.D. Gordon's labour Zionism, Micah Berdichveski's secular Zionism and Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook's religious Zionism, David Ben-Gurion's activist Zionism and Ze'ev Jabotinsky's revisionist Zionism. And there are obscure Zionists with their own Zionisms represented here as well, the Zionism of Rabbi Meir Bar Ilan and of Horace Mayer Kallen, of Samuel Hayyim Landau and of Rabbi Yehudah Alkalai.

Remarkably, this cornucopia of now relatively old ideas still feels both relevant and resonant. It overflows with insights about our present predicament as moderns and as Jews. Here, for example is Moses Hess, writing in 1862 about the strain on modern Jews and Christians battling between faith and reason:

"Jewish rationalists, who have as little reason to remain within the fold of Judaism as have the Christian rationalists for clinging to Christianity, are as inventive as their Christian friends in discovering new pretexts for the existence of a religion which, by the logic of their position, no longer has any raison d'etre."

Here, half a century later, is Jacob Klatzkin, articulating what we would now call the ethnic basis of a modern Jew's identity: "To be a Jew means the acceptance of neither a religious nor an ethical creed. We are neither a denomination nor a school of thought, but members of one family, bearers of a common history."

All these thinkers are struggling with the question that confounds so many modern Jews today: Why bother? Once we left the shtetl, once we stopped believing in the compulsory nature of the covenant and of Jewish law, once we could assimilate, why remain Jewish? And once we figured out why, the question became – and remains – how. How do we build an identity that is meaningful, authentic, rooted and real? How do we balance the anchors of Judaism with the freedoms of the modern world? How do we make something out of our Judaism and avoid the ennui of so many North American "nothings" who have abandoned their traditions, be they Jewish or non-Jewish?

> 'A century ago, Herzl said, "If you will it, it is no dream." Fifty years later, we can yet again cry " Im tirzu, ayn zu aggadah" '

Many of these Zionists were revolutionaries and subversives. They questioned many things about the modern world and sought to incorporate their Judaism and their Zionism into a broader vision of a better world. Marxist revolution has never been my thing, but I loved the reach of Ber Borochov's The National Question and the Class Struggle, trying to solve all the problems of the world, along with the Jewish problem, at once. I thrilled to the criticism often lobbed against the establishment, against the status quo, against Jewish passivity in Europe: Ahad Ha'am's complaint about how the Oral Law had become "fossilized"; Joseph Hayyim Brenner's critique that European Jewish history was "not a history of Sanctification of the Name, but a history of awaiting the chance to assimilate… The expulsions and the ghettos – these assured our survival"; and Brenner's lament that whenever Jews enjoyed a little bit of acceptance from their European neighbours, "[they] immediately starting aping them in everything, gave in on everything, and mustered the last of their meager strength to be like everyone else."

Of course, The Zionist Idea is no mere stroll around the modern identity smorgasbord. It is about Zionism, which is Jewish nationalism. Zionism places Israel front and centre in the Jewish national experience and narrative. All Zionists agree with Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, who said that "Eretz Israel is not something apart from the soul of the Jewish people; it is no mere national possession, serving as a means of unifying our people and buttressing its material, or even its spiritual survival. Eretz Israel is part of the very essence of our nationhood; it is bound organically to its very life and inner being."

One of the things that has always intrigued me about The Zionist Idea is that none of the writers emerged as my absolute favourite. I learned from their insights. I agreed with some, disagreed with others. I relished their engage-

Making the connection between addictions and spirituality

By RABBI ABRAHAM TWERSKI

Torah literature abounds with invaluable books. Choosing a favourite is almost like asking which of your children you love the most.

Nevertheless, the book that had the greatest impact on me is Path of the Just (Mesilas Yeshorim) by Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto (the Ramchal). I am not alone in this. The Gaon of Vilna said that, had they been contemporaries, he would have walked barefoot to learn mussar (ethics) from Rabbi Luzzatto. Before leaving his house, the Gaon would review a chapter of Mesilas Yeshorim 13 times!

For the past 30 years in my practice, I have largely been treating people addicted to alcohol or drugs. It is noteworthy that in reprimanding the Israelites, the prophets compare them to alcoholics, because behaviour that deviates from Torah is very similar to an alcoholic's behaviour. Instead of being dominated by alcohol, many people live under the compulsion of pursuit of wealth or acclaim, which, like alcohol or drugs, are insatiable drives. Others are addicted to one or more of a myriad of physical indulgences. Typically, they deny that their behaviour is errant, and may give ingenious rationalizations to justify their actions. They succeed in deceiving themselves even more than others.

The necessary steps to overcome any of these addictions involve the pursuit of spirituality. Mesilas Yeshorim is a text on spirituality. Many people may read Mesilas Yeshorim and be in full agreement with Rabbi Luzzatto, but make no changes in their lives. The alcoholic who comes to treatment has reached a point where he must make significant changes if he is to survive. The non-alcoholic mussar reader may not have this sense of desperation.

Unprecedented scientific advances have extended the human life span and have given us many inventions that make life more comfortable, to the point where our culture has become hedonistic. As Ramban says, ritual Torah observance can result in a person being a "frum" hedonist. But while technology has made life more comfortable, it has not made life more meaningful. Spirituality is what gives meaning to life.

Mesilas Yeshorim is a primer on spirituality. It is also a text for a graduate course on spirituality.

Rabbi Twerski, M.D., is the medical director of the Gateway Rehabilitation Center in Pittsburgh, Penn., an associate professor of psychiatry at the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine and the author of several books.

Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham chats with his Israeli counterpart, Shimon Peres, during a visit to Israel last year.

À la fin des années 1960, je suis tombé amoureux du Québec et de sa littérature. Salut Galarneau!, le roman de Jacques Godbout, compte certainement parmi les oeuvres littéraires de cette époque qui m'ont le plus marqué. François, le héros, incarne avec une candeur tellement poétique l'esprit anti-matérialiste de cette période.

J'apprenais qu'au Québec, le soleil avait un nom... propre: Galarneau. Depuis, lorsque je suis au bord de la mer, je pense toujours à ce sentiment d'éternité qu'éprouvait François au contact avec l'eau. Ce roman m'a permis d'apprécier encore plus Gaston Bachelard. Comment, en effet, ne pas se sentir éternel en contemplant l'eau, l'eau de la mer, des lacs ou du fleuve? Je sais que j'ai partagé le rêve de François Galarneau, soit celui d'être un écrivain de la vraie vie ou, comme il disait, de "vécrire". Grâce à ce livre, j'ai découvert qu'on pouvait écrire comme on respirait; c'était aussi naturel. Enfin, presque!

Plus tard, j'ai été séduit par l'univers romanesque de Michel Tremblay et par la sensibilité de cet écrivain. Je ne connais pas d'auteur qui aime autant ses personnages. La Grosse femme d'à côté est enceinte m'a touché profondément. Je retrouvais dans ce livre le monde merveilleux de l'enfance; il m'a révélé une période de l'histoire du Québec que je n'ai pas connue. Le récit se déroule en une seule journée au mois de mai 1942, quelques jours après le référendum sur la conscription, au cours duquel, comme on le sait, le Québec vota massivement contre le service militaire obligatoire.

Dans ce roman, paru en 1978, Tremblay pose un regard critique rafraîchissant sur le contexte entourant la crise de la conscription, regard probablement sans égal dans la littérature. Je me souviens d'une scène, qui a lieu dans une taverne, où un personnage du nom de Willy Ouellette remet les pendules à l'heure en osant contester les idées reçues de son entourage sur la guerre. Cette scène constitue un véritable morceau d'anthologie.

En tant que professeur de littérature - initié très tôt au plaisir des mots et à leur pouvoir de résonance, comment aurais-je pu échapper à mon destin?- j'estime que l'écrivain idéal est celui qui captive son lecteur et ne tient pas coûte que coûte à communiquer un "message". En fait, j'aime que le texte "respire", que je puisse lire entre les lignes... et rêvasser.

A trilogy for the Yamim Nora'im

By Shel Krakofsky

The Eyes of Tashlich mere hours after being dipped and engulfed in a mikvah of honey the apple is now brown and sour obeying Micah's admonition we turn our pockets and souls inside out pollute the cleansing stream flowing and scaled with the justice of cold-blooded fish their eyes always open nowhere a blink of forgiveness

we use crumbs of leavened bread teasing those fish to rise to the surface, shamelessly using sins for bait

our own necks up to water ablution incomplete
we try to reach Mount Moriah for a final thrust of trust next week we immerse ourselves beside the tainted hungry fish we thirst for purification the fish, for our return

the stunning array of opinions and visions. The Zionist Idea was less my manifesto than my launching pad, far more my spur to seek out and develop my own ideas than to dictate any concepts for me to echo or embrace.

During these trying and traumatic days, I find solace in thumbing through The Zionist Idea. For starters, the ideas and the idealism, the humanitarianism and the utopianism, offer a reality check, a factual contrast to the ugly slurs launched against Zionism. Reading The Zionist Idea reminds us of Zionism as it was and ought to be, not as it is caricatured and libelled, by both friends and foes. Zionism emerges as a rich, rollicking, multi-dimensional and many-splendored phenomenon. In this accurate series of snapshots, Zionism is not a synonym for racism, nor is a Zionist a political hack or bureaucrat or fanatic. The Zionist Idea reminds us that Zionism today can once again be an electric, inspiring movement, defined not just by the politics of the moment but by the possibilities of the future.

When you consider just how miserable conditions were in Europe and Palestine when these authors were writing, our current situation does not seem so bleak. A century ago, Herzl said, "If you will it, it is no dream." He dreamed of a Jewish state, and his wish came true 50 years later. Now, 50 years after that, we can yet again cry "Im tirzu, ayn zu aggadah," this time dreaming of peace in our old-new homeland, and success in our common human quest as Jews and as moderns to find meaning and satisfaction in our inner lives as well.

Gil Troy is a professor of history at McGill University. His book Why I Am A Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today is now in its second printing.

Yom Kippur, A Day for Atonement to the memory of Levi Yitzchak of Berdichev

i'm only here today to be with family and friends much nicer than you and to escape the hordes
i fear more than you and to proclaim that i like my neighbors more than you love your people

yes, we pollute are often cruel to each other even kill but when it comes to killing you are the biggest murderer the winner who eventually takes us all and shamelessly admits it with the divine arrogance of famine, earthquakes, hurricanes

if you listen closely today (though i think you are now beyond hearing aids) maybe you can learn something about love and justice although on spreading guilt you have no peer peddling the damaged goods your prophets and rabbinic wholesalers try to sell in exchange for charity, prayer, return it is you who is on trial not us so let's just be civil about this whole atonement business; when you close the gates of judgement just use a screen door and maybe i'll give you another chance

i'm not yet brave enough to ignore the passionate blast of the ram's horn so i'll just pen you in for the same kind of year you have in mind for the rest of us from now on you can start to take out your own garbage you'll hear no hebrew from me today a language you no longer speak or seem to understand

Rounding Third

I have seen it drip to the end with agonizing rust or snuffed quickly as glass under the wedding canopy

in this lateness of middle age with spaghetti spine, a heart that misfires like a speeding drunk
I ask to be spared from taking up golf fishing for minnows or lying in a hammock sedated with boredom don't make me listen to the piety of tepid aphorisms or provide a nurse, however luscious to clean up my drool and stool save me from family visiting too often or not enough

oh Lord
gird me, strengthen me, lift me up to lasso the occasional cloud make thunder clap with my pen's swirl subdue and shrivel lightning with good intentions alone teach me to scream without raising my voice leave me a mind with at least lacunae of elegance even as I crawl rounding third let me come home standing up

The elusive shekel

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

As the recession in Israel continues its apparently inexorable downward trend, many institutions that rely on donations are finding it more and more difficult to solicit funds. Many well-known and established institutions that look after those in need receive a major part of their funding from government sources, and shortfalls have generally been covered by non-governmental bodies and private donations. Today, as the recession in Israel bites harder and traditional sources of income from abroad have also been curtailed due to a harsher global business climate, many of Israel's organizations dedicated to improving the lifestyles of the disabled and sick and needy people are finding themselves in serious financial straits.

As if matters were not bad enough, the governmental bodies that grant funds to institutions, such as the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and local authorities, have all had their own budgets reduced dramatically as the country tightens its belt. These institutions now have to hunker down and face what would seem to be a long period of rising costs, reduced income and fewer volunteers.

Shekel, which in Hebrew is the acronym for "community services for the disabled," is one such organization. It has in its care over 4,500 Jewish and Arab children and adults. Many of the recipients of its aid programs are severely developmentally and/or physically disabled, and often require intensive, round-the-clock care and supervision. The organization maintains 43 group homes in Jerusalem, Petach Tikvah and the Bedouin town of Rahat. Three of these homes serve people with multiple disabilities; dedicated professional and volunteer helpers attempt to give each individual the maximum attention and mental stimulation.

David Goodman, originally from Johannesburg, is the director of the community housing project in Jerusalem.

"I joined Shekel 18 months ago," he says. "I am a social worker by profession working with people who have special needs and multiple handicaps or emotional needs... We don't specialize in a particular handicap – we work with everybody."

Goodman was speaking from a duplex apartment that is home to six women over 30. These women have varying degrees of developmental disabilities and are learning to live together in a Shekel-supervised apartment.

"Originally, this house was used as an emergency house, as the women who came here were generally [developmentally delayed] and being abused by their families," Goodman says. "Now this is the permanent home...

"The present group of six women come from different backgrounds and different experiences. There is one woman from Ethiopia who knew no Hebrew when she came to the apartment. She had been sexually abused in Ethiopia; as a result, she gave birth to two children who are now in an institution in Haifa. A lot of the work here is to give her a new connection with her children. The children sometimes come to Jerusalem for the weekend and she sometimes goes to Haifa with a Shekel helper to visit them.

"We aim that a typical day for our young ladies will be like that of any other citizen," Goodman says. "The only difference is that they need a little extra help when they wake up in the morning. Today, all six commute to work by public transport on their own. When they first arrived here, they needed special rides to take them around."

From 8 a.m. to about 3 p.m., the house is empty. Five of the women work in places not connected with Shekel and one works in a Shekel-operated sheltered workshop.

"The furniture you see was chosen by the women, as this is their permanent home," Goodman says. "They have a say as to how they will live; this is very important. I might also point out that before these ladies came here, they had not even chosen their own clothes, which now they do.

Menachem Yochanan supervises the physical therapy of Dror.

"There is, of course, similar housing for men as we have no mixed housing," says Goodman. "This doesn't mean that there is no social interaction between the houses. The ladies also go to social clubs, take part in plays and handicraft classes... they are sociable, happy and outgoing.

"Until they came here, nobody asked them what they wanted and what food they would like. Now they are part of their own destiny."

In Jerusalem, Shekel also operates four special vocational workshops for some 150 people with developmental and physical disabilities. Three of the workshops and Shekel's administrative centre are located in Jerusalem's Talpiot industrial area. The fourth is in a religious neighbourhood and caters only to men who are observant. The workshops are a hive of activity. Many participants, young and old, have various mobility problems and a large variety of special wheelchairs, many motorized, move around the workshop area. Several local businesses provide the workshops with jobs that require limited skill or concentration, although some projects require more dexterity.

Chisa Segawa, 30, and Kayoko Akutsu, 31, are both from Tokyo. They knew each other before volunteering at the Shekel workshop and both have visited Israel before.

Organization launched in 1979

"This is my third time in Israel and I volunteered to assist in vocational rehabilitation twice a week," says Segawa. "I came in April and I will spend about eight months here before I go home."

Both Segawa and Akutsu are members of the International Women's Federation of World Peace.

Akutsu, who is a trained cosmetician, has been to Israel twice before. She also volunteers at the workshop twice a week.

"I sometimes do worry about the security situation as I go around Jerusalem, but it wouldn't make me cut my visit short," she says.

Both Segawa and Akutsu have enough knowledge of Hebrew to communicate and help those who come to the workshop.

Shekel was established in 1979 by the Joint Distribution Committee in Jerusalem, Haifa, Bat Yam and Rehovot. The institutions in the three other locations have since stopped operating and the recipients of the aid have been absorbed into other local organizations. Today, Shekel focuses on community participation and integration. The emphasis on Jerusalem is in no small part due to the active support of the municipality.

"It costs about $9 million (US) to run Shekel activities every year," explains Clara Feldman, Shekel's executive director. "Between 70 and 75 per cent of our income comes from the government and local authorities. Most of the recipients of Shekel programs receive help throughout their lives for housing and training programs and this is protected somewhat by the law, which stipulates that the government must always support people [with disabilities]."

Shekel was established by the Joint Distribution Committee in Jerusalem

Feldman points out that all government and local authority grants are earmarked for special projects and this sometimes causes major problems when one particular program is underfunded.

"We are always appealing to private foundations and individuals in Israel and abroad to help us make up our shortfall."

One hostel that caters to children with multiple handicaps may have to close its doors when funds run out. The hostel, in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Har Nof, allows parents who have disabled children at home to send them there for a short time. This gives the parents a brief, much-needed period of relaxation. The professional work is very demanding and intense (a child who is severely autistic and/or developmentally disabled needs one-on-one attention). For the families of these children, the Shekel hostel represents the only possibility of some respite from the daily trauma of looking after their child at home.

"The older and bigger the child gets, the bigger the problem in dealing with their day-to-day needs," says Feldman. "For example, it is impossible for many parents to lift a fully grown person into and out of a wheelchair to attend to their basic needs – just think about it."

Feldman makes it clear that if Shekel did not exist, most of the recipients of these programs would just stay at home all day.

Shekel deals with all aspects of the lives of the disabled

"We are not the only organization in Israel that helps... but Shekel is unique in the way it does it," Feldman says. "We deal with all aspects of the life of the disabled, such as housing, leisure time and training programs every day of the year. We do not have a segregated system, we work with all kinds of handicapped people and with all strata of society – religious, non-religious, Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs. We have a very professional team and one helps the other, which is very important for the handicapped themselves."

Shekel has about 400 staff from all over Israel and some 200 local volunteers. Before the start of the intifadah, a large number of young volunteers came from abroad, some of whom used to work at Shekel for up to 15 months. They were given apartments during their stay and were reimbursed for their travel expenses and given spending money.

"Now," says Feldman, "they just don't come. I need to employ people to fill the gaps left by the lack of overseas volunteers, but I have no budget for this."

Shekel's activities are directed mainly to people with developmental disabilities, who represent some 60 per cent of those receiving help from the organization. Some 25 to 30 per cent of them have both mental and physical problems. The remainder have emotional illnesses, drug and drink-related problems or are homeless.

"We do not refuse anybody help; we give him the help he needs, specially tailored to his requirements," says Feldman.

Menachem Yochanan is responsible for three apartments in Jerusalem and one apartment in Petach Tikvah. Each apartment caters to children and young people with multiple handicaps.

"This apartment, which is situated in the Gilo neighbourhood is home for six; they grow up together, and professional help comes to them in the community, rather than [having them] sent to an institution," Yochanan says. "We have found that this integrated policy [brings] great dividends to the welfare and improvement of the children. In Petach Tikvah, we have a hostel for 16 profoundly handicapped young people, but unfortunately, unlike our experience in Jerusalem, we get no help from the local authority."

Yochanan is in charge of the professional group and the volunteers who work in the four apartments. He has to remain within the budget for food, transport and special services. He also is responsible for keeping in close contact with the parents of the children.

"I must tell you that the relationship between the parents and Shekel is of the very best. You have to understand that this apartment is their home forever and we try to make their lives as constructive and happy as possible."

On one visit, five children are being prepared for an outing to a swimming pool. A sixth child, Dror, will join them later as he has to have some physiotherapy, supervised by Yochanan.

"When Dror first came to the apartment two years ago, he was nine years old. He was like a baby, he only drank from a bottle and ate only puréed food. He didn't know how to speak. Today Dror is advancing so much, to our great pleasure. He is learning to walk with the aid of a walking aid and he no longer wears diapers. You can have a simple conversation with him and he loves looking at pictures. He now goes to a special school which is able to maximize his potential. He has four normal brothers and a fifth brother who also has some disabilities.

"Dror for us is undoubtedly a success story. There is no doubt that the more time you can invest into a child the more you will get back in their improvement. One has to have patience."

In the meantime, Galia, who will soon be 30 years old, is preparing the evening meal for the children when they return from the pool. Galia lives on her own in a Shekel apartment with a small amount of regular supervision.

Galia cooks in her Shkel apartment. [Isranet photos]

Galia is also somewhat delayed, but she is able to contribute in a way that helps both Shekel and herself. She receives a small monthly wage for her services.

Her help is very important, Yochanan says. "We don't have volunteers today because of the political situation. Usually we need six volunteers in each apartment. Today we have two professionals in the apartment at night and four during the day... Galia's degree of responsibility is very high."

Adrienne Dodi, Shekel's director of resource development, says, "Most organizations start off at the initiative of parents or volunteers. Shekel started out at as a result of professionals seeing a need.

"They saw that in much of the western world there was a trend for handicapped people to gradually move from institutions back to the community. In order to further the development of these services, they realized that they would have to create a framework for this to happen.

"Shekel is the result of this new thinking. Shekel believes that the place for everyone is in the community. Ideally, no one should be confined to an institution."

Amsterdam: The 'mokum' of Jewish freedom

By MYRIAM SHECHTER

In a small park next to the world famous Amsterdam Portuguese Synagogue called the Esnoga stands the statue of a docker. A robust, simple man with a little paunch, his fists clenched, his feet firmly entrenched, he defies a world gone mad. On Feb. 25, 1941, together with other Dutch workers, he went on strike to protest the round-up of Amsterdam's Jews.

For me, this man – symbolically brought to life by artist Mari Andriessen – stands for Amsterdam, the haven for Jews from all over Europe, Sephardim and Ashkenazim alike, the place where, in 1796, Jews were granted equal rights with the Dutch citizens, the place where many gentiles rose to protest the deportation of the Jews and organized a large network to hide thousands of people from the Nazis.

The interior of the famous Portuguese Synagogue.

The tolerant Amsterdam of the Middle Ages is still tolerant in the third millennium. It tolerates coffeehouses where you can purchase drugs legally, it tolerates the famous red light district – by now a quaint tourist curiosity – and it tolerates the 17 million bicycles that make walking on its streets a constantly risky adventure. And it accepted the Jews when most of the world was chasing them from place to place.

Today, Amsterdam has a prosperous Jewish community that traces its origins to the end of the 16th century. Those first arrivals were, according to Prof. Carl Gebhardt, "Roman Catholics without faith and Jews without knowledge, but wishing to be Jews." However, over the next few centuries, this community would exert its influence over Jewish life in Europe and even in the New World.

But let us back up about one century and travel south to the Iberian Peninsula. In 1492, the Holy Inquisition gave Spain's Jews the choice of either conversion to Christianity or exile. Many fled to Portugal, where they were forcibly converted in 1497; these New Christians, most of them secret Jews, were under the constant close scrutiny and bloody persecution of the Inquisition. The Portuguese converts, also called Marranos, started looking for ways to escape from the Inquisition's grip, but at that time Holland, under Spanish domination and within reach of the Inquisition, was not a possibility. Instead, they spread into Northern Africa, Italy, France, Turkey and also on northern routes towards Belgium, Germany and even Scandinavia. It would take another century for the Marranos to find their way to Amsterdam.

In 1579, the Union of Utrecht established the Protestant Dutch provinces, finally independent from Spanish Catholic rule; one of the important terms of the union was "freedom of conscience." In this hospitable environment, and free from the dreaded arm of the Inquisition, Amsterdam became home to a flourishing Jewish community, where the Marranos, who had lost almost all their knowledge of Jewish beliefs and practices, joyously and openly returned to Judaism.

Originally, there were three Sephardi shul communities in Amsterdam: Beth Jacob, founded around 1602, Neveh Shalom, established between 1608 and 1612 by Jews of Spanish origin, and Beth Israel, founded in 1618. The three communities began co-operating in 1622, eventually merging in 1639 to form Talmud Torah, the Portuguese Jewish community of Amsterdam.

The founder of the Amsterdam community, Uri Halevy, entered history as the first rabbi to bring Marranos back to Judaism. His son Aaron, the community's mohel, performed close to 1,000 circumcisions, as the new arrivals returned formally to their ancestors' faith.

Country home to large population of Ashkenazi Jews

Another prominent figure from this period was Menasseh ben Israel, who became rabbi of the Neveh Shalom synagogue in 1622 when he was only 18 years old. A friend of Rembrandt's, who illustrated one of his books, Rabbi ben Israel was instrumental in obtaining admission to England for the Jews. He also founded the first Jewish printing house in Amsterdam which, in 1627, published the first Hebrew prayer book printed with Hebrew characters.

The highly educated Portuguese Jews – they maintained their Portuguese status to distance themselves from the hated Spanish identity – quickly integrated themselves into Dutch society, but conserved the memory of their ancestors' peregrinations from Portugal to Holland.

I talked to Rudie Cortissos, the president of Amsterdam's famed Portuguese Synagogue. Like most other Dutch Jews of Portuguese ancestry, he can trace his family's history all the way back to Portugal. The Cortissos fled first to Spain, then to France – Bayonne, Bordeaux, Rouen, Paris – then Brussels, Antwerp and finally to Amsterdam.

Beside the Portuguese community, Amsterdam also became home to a large population of Ashkenazi Jews. Around 1630, they began to arrive from central and eastern Europe, fleeing the violence of wars, persecution and pogroms. This was to be a group very different from the Sephardim. While the latter were wealthy, established merchants who maintained their Portuguese language but also quickly acquired a thorough knowledge of Dutch, the Ashkenazi refugees were penniless, destitute Yiddish speakers who took a long time to escape poverty.

Amsterdam's dock worker statue stands testimony to the city's protest of the round up of Jews during the Holocaust.

Jews were allowed to settle anywhere, did not have to wear distinctive clothing and were allowed to practise their religion freely. But they were banned from joining guilds and becoming registered tradesmen, and were thus unable to open shops or become craftsmen. The only guilds open to Jews were the brokers' guild – mostly beneficial to Portuguese Jews – and the printers' and surgeons' guilds.

In 1796, Jews were granted equal rights and eventually, with the development of the diamond industry, the Ashkenazi community began to prosper. The "Jewish" name for Amsterdam, "mokum," is their legacy, as Amsterdam became their "place" – makom in Hebrew – their free home at last.

The two communities – Portuguese and Ashkenazi – came from completely different backgrounds and, therefore, had separate places of worship.

The Portuguese community commissioned architect Elias Bouman to build them a magnificent synagogue, the Esnoga, or Snoga (derived from "synagogue"). Completed between 1671 and 1675 and modelled after the Temple of Solomon in Jerusalem, it was the largest synagogue in the world. The many surviving engravings and paintings made of this astonishing building show it unchanged today, after more than 300 years of continuous use.

Imagine walking into Esnoga's stately hall through its entrance, over which is written in Hebrew, "I shall enter Your house through Your abundant kindness," words which include within their letters the year 1672 (when the building was supposed to be ready) and the name Aboab, the chacham who initiated the building of the synagogue. Maybe it is Yom Kippur and more than 1,000 candles illuminate the warm wood of the ark, the bimah, and the seats facing each other across a central aisle. The members of the synagogue, most of whom trace their ancestry hundreds of years, wear ceremonial top hats.

The Esnoga has no electricity or central heating; during the winter months, a smaller synagogue, located in the low buildings surrounding the main structure, serves as the place of worship. These buildings also include classrooms for children, offices and the world famous Ets Haim library, the oldest operating Jewish library in the world. Its venerable bookshelves contain about 500 manuscripts, some dating from the 13th century, and about 30,000 printed titles from 1484 to the present day. An educational institute based on strict religious observance, the library extends its scope to cover philosophy, law, medicine, ethics, mysticism and even literature and music.

Rabbi Rosenberg, Ets Haim's librarian, kindly allowed me to handle some of the old manuscripts and medieval printed books. It is impossible to describe the thrill, the emotion of touching these beautifully illustrated volumes that have been handled by generations of illustrious scholars such as Rabbi ben Israel, the philosopher Baruch Spinoza, or Isaac Aboab, the founder of the Esnoga. An unforgettable experience.

The medieval Ashkenazi community, in its turn, built for its members a number of synagogues, four of which were located on a complex very close to the Portuguese Synagogue in what was then the Jewish neighbourhood: the Great Synagogue (1671), the Obbene Shul (1685), the Dritt Shul (1700) and the New Synagogue (1752). Until 1943, each functioned separately as a place of prayer and study.

These four synagogues, and a mikvah located on the premises of the complex, were restored and reopened by Queen Beatrix in 1987 as the new Jewish Historical Museum, an architectural unit that links the past and the present, and serves as a permanent reminder of the history and culture of the Jews in Amsterdam and of the devastation of the Holocaust. (The museum, which first opened in 1932, had previously been located in the medieval Weigh House.)

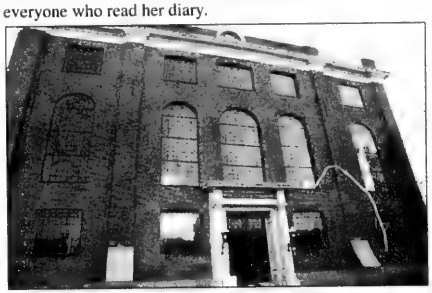
The area surrounding the Jewish Historical Museum, as well as the Portuguese Synagogue, is an open book of the history of the Dutch Jewish community. The former Jewish quarter juxtaposes medieval Jewish life and the terrible legacy of the Holocaust with Amsterdam's gracious architecture and the romantic network of its canals reflecting in their calm waters the fairy tale-like houses, the trees and the picturesque boathouses. Rembrandt lived here in his red-shuttered house, using his Jewish friends and neighbours as models for his paintings. The Waterlooplein Flea Market tells stories of the Jews, who, barred from owning shops, bought and sold goods on the street.

Not far from the market, a sombre black marble memorial is dedicated to the memory of Holocaust victims. Of Netherlands' 140,000 Jews – two thirds of whom lived in Amsterdam – 100,000 died in concentration camps. Sixteen thousand people went underground with the help of members of the Dutch Resistance; half of those were captured and deported, first to Westerbork, and from there to Auschwitz and Sobibor. In a small park on Weesperstraat, another monument honours "the protectors of the Dutch Jewish people during the occupation years."

The Resistance movement was formed by ordinary people who, because of their moral outrage, risked their lives to shelter the Jews and the young men called up for forced labour camps in Germany. They concealed thousands of people and found hiding places for children. They were the exceptional "hidden heroes" of this dark period.

Most famous among the Jews in hiding was Anne Frank, the young girl who left behind a diary that touched the world. The house on Prinsengracht Canal, where the Frank family was hidden between 1942 and 1945, has become a pilgrimage place and a testimony to the courage of those who dared oppose the Nazis.

Just around the corner from the house, a modest-sized statue of Anne Frank belies the huge impact the girl had on everyone who read her diary.



The Portuguese Synagogue of Amsterdam, the Esnoga.

I am sitting in the park next to the Portuguese Synagogue, saying goodbye to Amsterdam. I look at the celebrated building with a tinge of sadness. There are practically no more Jews living in the former Jewish quarter; other areas, such as the Amstelveen suburb, with its six new synagogues, are now home to the thriving Jewish community. It is too far to walk from there to the Esnoga for Shabbat or holiday services. From a pre-war membership of 4,700, the synagogue has only about 500 members left now. "We will have to close [it] down," ponders the Esnoga's president Rudie Cortissos, "but we will build a new one" where the members reside now.

And the Esnoga? It will eventually follow the example of the old Ashkenazi synagogues and become a museum, perhaps opening only for High Holy Day services. Together with the defiant statue of the docker, it will attest to the resilience of the Jewish people and of the country that adopted them.

University aids Argentinian students

By GAIL LICHTMAN
Israel Press Service

The year 5762 was not a good one for Argentina and its Jewish community of about 200,000, the largest in Latin America. Financially, the severe economic and political crisis all but wiped out most of the country's middle class and with it, most of the assets of the Jewish community.

But for some Argentinians, 5763 is holding out the promise of a better life, a new beginning in their old/new homeland – Israel – thanks to a special recruitment project recently launched by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The one-year project, being conducted in co-operation with the Jewish Agency for Israel, the Student Authority and the Jerusalem Municipality, aims to encourage Argentinian students to study at the Hebrew University by offering them extra incentives beyond the standard tuition package for new immigrant students (paid by the Student Authority). These include offering qualified Argentinian students free dormitory rooms for the first year, additional financial aid and more flexible and quicker admissions processing (including Spanish-speaking personnel to assist the students).

"The University is going out of its way to create the best conditions to facilitate the absorption of these students and is putting out the reddest of red carpets for them," says the university rector, Haim Rabinowitch.

As part of the project, Argentinian-born pharmacology professor Jaime Kapitulnik, who himself made aliyah in 1963, travelled to Argentina in February to interview 180 students referred to him by the Jewish Agency. More than 50 of them registered for the 2002-2003 academic year and have already arrived in Israel.

Kapitulnik had another trip planned this summer to the Jewish Agency's Expo Aliya and is confident that the project will include some 100 students for the coming academic year.

Martin Kohan, 28, grew up in Concepcion del Uruguay, where his father is a doctor and hospital department head. He completed bachelor's degrees in biochemistry and chemistry in Buenos Aires and will be starting a special master's program in medical research at the Hebrew University's faculty of medicine that will enable him to continue on and work towards a PhD in four years.

"I came to Israel because I am a Jew," he says. "I went to Hebrew school and was in a Jewish youth movement. Studying in Israel is providing me with the opportunity to fulfil two very important things – my Jewish identity and my professional objectives. Here, I feel at home as a Jew, and the very high level of medical research means I do not have to sacrifice my professional goals.

"I know that I did not choose a good time to make aliyah," he adds, "but then there has never really been a good time in the history of this country. If you want to come, you have to come, and that's it."

Lilaj Latker, 23, was born in Israel to Argentinian parents. In 1986, when she was seven, the family returned to Buenos Aires. Latker attended Jewish elementary and high schools and later studied at the Universita de Buenos Aires.

"Our family never lost its connection to Israel," she claims. "We were always a very Zionistic family and my brother and I always talked about coming back to Israel."

In January 2002, Latker and her 21-year-old brother arrived in Israel with the Birthright Israel program – their first time back in 16 years, and decided to remain. Latker entered an ulpan in Ashkelon and her brother went to a kibbutz in the north. Latker will begin studying either first-year psychology or social work at the Hebrew University in the fall; her brother will be starting the preparatory program.

"The situation in Argentina today is terrible," Latker says. "Young people want a future, but there is no future in Argentina. Israel holds out that promise for us. I feel much more secure in Israel because I know that the government here cares about the people. The fact that the university is providing free dorm rooms is also a blessing for us. So too are the Spanish-speaking staff members who explain everything about the programs to us and help with the bureaucratic procedures. They opened their hearts to us and I really appreciate this."

Carla Landau, 21, came on aliyah in March 2002 from Behia Blanca, a small city in southern Argentina with a Jewish community of some 300 families. She has been living in a Jerusalem absorption centre and will start studying medicine at the Hebrew University in the fall.

"I always loved Israel and wanted to come to live here," says Landau, who was a leader in her local Zionist youth movement and studied in Machon Greenberg in Jerusalem, an institute for training Jewish teachers. "In Argentina, you are someone if your parents have money. In Israel, you are what you make of yourself. I am sure that a young person with talent can achieve great things in Israel."

Landau met Kapitulnik during his recruiting visit to Argentina in February 2002. "The Hebrew University is undertaking a really great Zionist enterprise. When I first considered aliyah, I was afraid my studies in Argentina would not be recognized, but that is not the case. This has enabled me to skip the preparatory year and begin my medical studies immediately. The university is not giving us a free ride; it is simply meeting us halfway. Also Prof. Kapitulnik remembered me and welcomed me like a daughter. It is really important for me to feel that I am not alone and that there are those I can turn to for help and support. It is not easy to decide on aliyah. You want to be sure you have a secure place. The university is providing us with such a place."

Israeli judges look to Canada for constitutional guidance

By AMNON REICHMAN

One would have to be quite removed from the comparative legal scene to miss the emergence of Canadian jurisprudence as a source of inspiration to like-minded jurisdictions around the globe.

The Indian courts turn to the Canadian judiciary when confronted with human rights issues; the Australian courts are well versed in constitutional developments in Canada; the South African drafters of that country's interim and final constitutions, and constitutional scholars and judges on the constitutional court, rely on the Canadian experience in charting South Africa's path back to democracy and the meaningful protection of human rights.

Even scholars, politicians and judges in Great Britain, whose legal system has been at the centre of jurisprudential gravity for centuries, are taking a close look at the Canadian Constitution, and in particular the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and its evolving interpretations, as they debate the best forms and procedures through which to accord legal protections to fundamental rights in Britain under the British Human Rights Act of 1998.

In this respect, Israel is no exception. The realization that human rights are a necessary component of any democratic system of governance, as enshrined in the Canadian Charter, is shared by the Israeli legal system, which embarked upon the constitutionalization of some fundamental rights a decade after the Charter enactment in 1982.

Section 1 of the Charter served as a model for the Israeli limitation clause. Section 1 states that protected rights cannot be infringed by the government except for limits prescribed by law that can be demonstrably justified in a democratic society. The Canadian clause uses the phrase "free and democratic," whereas the Israeli clause uses the phrase "Jewish and democratic." The essence is similar, though not identical, especially since the Israeli Supreme Court has suggested that "Jewish and democratic" means the overlapping values and principles that are both Jewish and democratic – that is, that can be demonstrably justified as parts of both Jewish tradition and democratic theory and experience.

The Canadian override clause is commonly known as the "notwithstanding clause." It allows legislatures to enact a statute notwithstanding the violation of a protected right, provided the statute declares its infringing nature explicitly (by using the phrase "notwithstanding").

It was imported to Israel to allow the legislature to override judicial interpretation of fundamental rights. As in Canada, such a statute will cease to be in force after several years (in Canada five and in Israel four, since the Canadian election cycle is five years and in Israel elections must be held every four years). The rationale is clear: to allow voters to voice their opinions on whether the rights infringement was indeed called for (assuming that if it was not, the sponsors will pay a political price) and to instruct their representatives whether the infringing statute should be re-enacted. In Israel, enacting a notwithstanding statute requires the actual support of the majority of Knesset members (at least 61 of 120 must vote in favour), whereas in Canada, any majority will do.

But the mechanism of rights protection as part of a democratic regime based on the meaningful consent of the governed is not the end of the comparative tale. Israeli judges often refer to, and rely on, Canadian cases for guidance and support.

When the Israeli Supreme Court ordered the Air Force to admit women to its prestigious and highly demanding flight school, it referred to the Blainey case. In that instance, the Ontario Court of Appeal ordered a hockey league to admit girls. In rejecting the Air Force's argument that admitting women would require a substantial budget increase (for separate facilities, but more importantly for the training of more pilots, since women are likely to be unable to fly for substantially longer periods of time than men, especially if the differential years of reserve service are taken into account), the Israeli court relied on Singh v. Canada, for the proposition that budgetary considerations carry little weight in justifying the infringement of human rights.

Canada's famous Oakes test, which interpreted the limitation clause, has also long since been incorporated into Israeli jurisprudence and is being relied on by the courts.

As well, Hill v. Church of Scientology was relied upon for the proposition that reputation must also be a component of a democratic society and hence may limit freedom of expression; R. v. Keegstra was analyzed and refined when the Israeli Supreme Court dealt with Holocaust-related expression; Schachter v. Canada was relied on to establish the remedy of suspending a judicial declaration of invalidity until Parliament has had the opportunity to address the matter; and the Manitoba Language Rights case was analyzed regarding the effect of declaring a large number of legislative acts unconstitutional.

In addition to case law, works by Canadian legal scholars such as Peter Hogg are routinely consulted by Israeli lawyers, judges and academics, as well as the Israeli Supreme Court.

On a personal level, the transnational dialogue between Canadian judges and prominent scholars, primarily in the field of constitutional law, is commonplace. Senior government lawyers and judges in Israel have probably met their Canadian counterparts at least once.

This, of course, is not to suggest that the Israeli system mimics Canadian precedents, or that all Canadian decisions and opinions are incorporated automatically.

to Catholic schools raises no constitutional issue is taken by scholars as an example that all systems have their blind spots. And the Supreme Court decision in R. v. Finta barring in fact the ability to prosecute Nazi-era war crimes in Canada is seen by some as a cop-out.

Some Israeli judges are presumably eagerly awaiting the appropriate case to test Canadian-made (or Canadian-refined) judicial powers. Meanwhile, other judges and scholars ponder the possible ramifications of exercising judicial review over legislative silence and "reading in" missing words in existing statutes (as was done in Vriend v. Alberta on the issue of gay rights), or the full magnitude of allowing judges to determine constitutionality based on "unwritten constitutional principles" (as was done in the Monfort Hospital case).

It might be interesting to note that Israeli judges are comfortable with the idea of unwritten principles as the basis for a robust structure of human rights protection. But thus far that doctrine, much like its British source, has been limited to the area of administrative law, in which the acts of the administration were required to be based upon explicit statutory authorization if such acts infringed human rights. In the area of administrative law, then, Israeli jurisprudence is perhaps more advanced than the current state of Canadian law. It is still an open question whether the Israeli Court will expand this doctrine to the constitutional arena, as the Canadian case in point suggests.

Charter and its case law a model for enshrining human rights

In short, the Israeli legal system takes the Canadian scene seriously. The Canadian constitutional provisions are carefully read, cases are analyzed and academic writings are consulted. For many members of the Israeli bench, bar and academia, this comparative exercise is standard practice.

Being in the legal limelight as a source of guidance and inspiration brings with it responsibility. Canada's rich and nuanced experience in developing structures for the protection of human rights and doctrines for implementing and formalizing judgments on human rights matters must have something to say about the recent events in the Middle East.

Clearly, these events have human rights dimensions. They involve the rights of Palestinians and Israelis to self-determination. They involve the rights of the Palestinians to a democratic system of governance, as well as the rights of Israeli citizens to live free from terror. The right of return of both people can be seen as a human right. The status of Palestinian refugees in the West Bank, Gaza and neighbouring Arab states certainly raises human rights concerns.

It would seem that the input of Canadian human rights experts could help elucidate the different aspects of the conflict.

It is regretful to many Israelis that the Canadian electronic media sometimes fall short of providing ordinary Canadian citizens with a multidimensional picture and instead present a rather simplistic, if not incomplete or skewed, account of events.

It is also regretful that some politicians opt for such underdeveloped approaches as well.

Yet the Canadian body of human rights knowledge should not remain unengaged. In our shared struggle for the realization of human rights for all, the sober, fully informed and experienced Canadian voice should be heard; dialogue should be expanded and deepened; and constructive criticism and a call for self-reflection from all parties articulated. It could benefit us all.

Amnon Reichman is a professor of constitutional law at Haifa University. He is currently visiting Canada.

A few divine miracles

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

One decision, large or small, can change our lives forever. How much truer is that statement when the decision is made smack in the middle of wartime.

It was the spring of 1942. My Bubbie and Zaidy and their 2 children lived in Château Gontier, France. (Esther, Pinkas, Cecile, Fanny.) Forced residence. My Bubbie was 2 months pregnant with my father.

At this time, Jewish residents of Occupied Northern France had to wear the Jewish Star of David, and to report their whereabouts twice daily to the German command. They were not allowed to leave their homes after 8 p.m. Their passports were stamped. Irrevocable ID.

The laws against the Jews kept building. Outside, the sun was high and the sidewalks warm. Inside, my Bubbie was afraid to have the child. One of her husband's wealthy friends arranged a meeting with an abortionist in Paris: Felony Extra-ordinaire.

She went by train. To see her friends and get to her "meeting." She was unaware that a French official had seen her board the train and reported her to the Germans, who had staff deployed to the Paris station immediately.

The scene of the crime.

And they didn't even know about the abortionist.

She was arrested with another Jewish woman who happened to be caught doing the same thing at the same time in the same section of the train.

For 4 days she occupied a jail cell.

There were 10 other girls. French girls whose husbands were leftists. French girls who were suspected of Communism. The big C word.

They all thought she was a prostitute. For food, they were given black water. For personal hygiene, an open toilet. (A community of sharing.)

My Bubbie didn't eat or go to the bathroom for 4 days.
An infinity.
A dark tomb of nail-biting, unyielding worries.

Will I ever see my babies again?
What will I do if I get out?
Do I want this abortion after all?

But she got out. By the grace of Lord Knows Who. Or by Divine Miracle itself.

A streetcorner in Paris was where The Decision was made. One of those decisions where the decision has you. The abortionist was to her left, home in Château-Gontier was to her right.

She caught sight of an eagle-eyed German sentry stationed nearby. The sight of his uniform cemented the thought that had been germinating unknowingly for days.

"What I could do with two children I would do with three," she thought. She turned right. To the Gare du Nord métro. 3 months pregnant.

2½ months pregnant later, the Germans came to her door and took her husband away to the record-books, where his name would be found years later amidst millions of others. Pinkas Honig. Death by "Double Pneumonia." (read: Auschwitz.) He left behind

1 wife-Bubbie.
His 2 children.
And 1 fetus.

That day: July 16, 1942. The first deportation in France. The day my Bubbie stopped sleeping.

3 months pregnant later (total: 8½ months), she barely heard them come again. Their German car ran smoothly, softly, on gas. Not like French cars that ran on coal. The door shut quietly and their boots clicked up 2 flights of stairs. 2 or 3 men, she doesn't remember. It was 5 in the morning.

They said, "Make yourself ready – you're joining your husband." As if she should be thanking them for the opportunity. So she faked labour. They balked. The Nazi manual didn't cover this scenario. They didn't want labour stains all over their pristine Mercedes. They left.

When they came back for her and her 2 children
and 1 fetus

she had gone and taken her Jewish blood with her. Felony Très Extra-ordinaire.

1 Bubbie. Now in a convent.
Her 2 daughters, in a Catholic home.
My father, in the care of a woman with her own baby who would camaflouge his crying.

When the other baby got sick, he was taken to a Catholic orphanage in Angers. No longer a fetus.

A web of deceit and protection to hide 4 Jews in France for the rest of the war, created by 2 unorthodox and heroic Frenchwomen and their families who will never be forgotten.

My Bubbie says, "A stone of 1,000 pounds fell off my chest when I decided to go home."

Her choice gave me:

1 Bubbie
2 aunts
2 uncles (married in)
3 cousins
1 father, no longer a fetus
1 mother (married in)
2 brothers
1 sister
1 brother-in-law (married in) and me.

1 Decision.
And a few Divine Miracles.
I'm here to tell you the story.

A survivor's claim against the Claims Conference

By ELI PFEFFERKORN

An innocent passerby walking by the Russell Community Centre in Miami on Feb. 23 would have seen an odd mix of people debating no less an odd issue. Customarily, they would meet to protest against Holocaust deniers and revisionists, or voice their abhorrence at the erection of crosses in Auschwitz by the Carmelite Order. However, this time, as in recent years, the representatives of the 46 survivors' organizations met to express their anger with, and frustration at, a Jewish organization, an organization that was supposed to have been survivor-friendly.

The Claims Conference (whose official name is the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany) was founded on Sept. 10, 1952. Its responsibility was to negotiate with the federal government of Germany for reparation payments for survivors, and for the owners or their kin for property lost during the war. In theory, the conference was intended to represent the survivors and the other claimants against the German government. In reality, it became a trustee of billions of dollars, unanswerable to their legitimate beneficiaries. The survivors have been kept in the dark about the ongoing negotiations and the principles guiding the distribution of the money received.

Despite promises to make the institution more transparent, writes Netty Gross in the Jerusalem Report of May 7, 2001, "the atmosphere of mystery persists. The conference remains, in large part, an insular and secretive organization."

Not to put too fine a point on it: the Claims Conference is dealing with blood money and one would have expected its officials, therefore, to treat it with the sensitivity, integrity and responsiveness that the survivors' human situation warrants. But this was not to be.

> Despite promises to make the institution more transparent 'the atmosphere of mystery persists. The conference remains, in large part, an insular and secretive organization'

Instead of openness, a veil of opaqueness descended on the conference's activities. There is no accountability for monetary allocations, no transparency of budget breakdown. To fend off the increasing criticism of the print media such as the Forward, the Jerusalem Report, the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz – not to mention the newsletters issued by survivors' orgainzations – the conference printed a couple of brochures in 1998 and 1999 reporting on its activities. But the information they contain is mere smokescreens, intended more to obfuscate than educate, conceal than reveal. How is it possible that a non-elective body of trustees is doing its business as if it were a private estate hidden from the public eye, and turning a deaf ear to the survivors' and beneficiaries' concerns?

Apparently, the Claims Conference enjoys a special legal status that gives it immunity from being sued in the United States. Over the years, the hundreds of suits that have been filed by survivors against the conference have been, with one exception, thrown out of court on the grounds of the defendant's immunity from litigation. What is intriguing about these litigations is that the conference retains pricey Manhattan lawyers who are paid from the restitution money – money that belongs to the survivors – to fight the survivors in court. Neologists will want to find a new word to define this new brand of cynicism. How did it happen that the conference has received such an extraordinary status? The legal experts advise me that the agreement between it and the German government was an arrangement of convenience for both parties. The agreement benefited postwar Germany in that it enabled it to obtain forgiveness from the Jewish world organizations. As a result, it was readmitted to the international community. It benefited the conference in that it became the exclusive transfer money channel, giving it the status of trustee of billions of dollars – after the 1965 cut-off date. In addition, the agreement freed Germany from the burden of dealing with individual cases. The literature pertaining to the subject unambiguously indicates that the German governments of both political parties intended the survivors to be the beneficiaries of the restitution money.

"The Claims Conference, however," observes David A. Lash, head of a Los Angeles-based legal aid service representing many Holocaust survivors, "has not focused on the tens of thousands of faceless, voiceless survivors."

In an article called "Poor Justice" in the Daily News of Los Angeles of Sept. 19, 1992, Lash points out that instead of caring for the elderly and the needy survivors, the conference "finds itself immersed in high profile matters, pushed to the centre stage by the rich and the powerful."

And as befits the rich and powerful, the conference's officials convened in luxurious Manhattan hotels, such as the Pierre Hotel in 1999 and the Waldorf Astoria in 2000, where they toasted their new financial acquisitions, oblivious to the people for whom the money is intended. And even as the conventioneers slapped each other's backs in self-satisfaction and glowed in each other's speeches, dozens of destitute survivors trod the sidewalks of the hotel protesting the wrong being done to them. These "faceless," "voiceless" survivors once had a spokesperson to give voice to their anguish, articulate their concerns and shield their dignity.

In an aptly titled essay, "A Plea for Survivors," Elie Wiesel castigates the Jewish organizations for sidelining the survivors: "Do you know that not one survivor was asked to be a member of the special council in charge of the financial reparations negotiations with West Germany – not one survivor was given a chance to air his views on the distribution of funds – not one survivor sat on the famous Claims Conference? Others expressed themselves on behalf of the dead, not they. Others managed their inheritance; they were not considered qualified even to plead their own cause in their own behalf."

These words were taken from the suvivors' pain three decades ago. But since Wiesel's climb to the gilded iconic pedestal, his gaze has been scanning international horizons and his voice addressing issues of humanity at large. We survivors, alas, are mentioned at commemorations of the dead victims. Notwithstanding the insulated make-up of the Claims Conference, some changes have occurred. According to the conference's 1998-99 annual report, its board of directors comprises 49 members. Out of this number, four are survivors. Three survivors are seated on the allocations committee (the one responsible for money disbursement), out of a total of 14 members.

Israel Singer, a reputed master negotiator who was instrumental in obtaining mega-dollars from Germany, was unable to negotiate a livable payment for destitute survivors. Article 2 Fund, established in 1992, was intended for those survivors who, for a variety of reasons, did not register for the Wiedergutmachen, which could result in a monthly pension, in accordance with the German Federal Indemnification Law. Some of us simply missed the deadline; others were not psychologically ready to go through the registration procedure.

The agreement reached between the Claims Conference negotiating team, presumably headed by Singer, and the German government, agreed that a survivor and his or her spouse would receive DM 500 monthly on condition that their joint annual gross income (Canada pension exempted) does not exceed $40,000 (Cdn) gross. This seems to be an arbitrary cut-off sum, lacking a grading scale by which specific needs of the individual recipient are taken into account. As we grow older, our medical expenses increase, not all of them covered by the Canadian National Health Program or by U.S. Medicare. The economic circumstances of survivors were among the factors that the conference negotiation team ignored. Is it surprising? I don't think so.

'What they know about survival'

What Singer and his associates of the Claims Conference know about survival and survivorship they know vicariously. They did not stand on the roll call ground in the sweltering heat or windswept cold; their eyes did not follow the hangman's baton on the selection line; their stomach did not churn the acid circling in the stomach entrails seeking morsels of food. What do they know about loneliness? Loneliness, gnawing loneliness; and yes, loneliness after liberation.

I don't expect Singer and his associates to share the ordeals of survivors, but what I do expect of them is to show understanding and, if possible, sensitivity, not only as fellow Jews, but as human beings. Who would have thought at the time, even in the grotesque of nightmares, that 40, 50 years later we would have to demand our entitlements and our dignity from an organization that has been putatively charged with protecting them? Life seems to abound in ironies. One telling example is how the conference relates to survivors. This is a Canada moment.

Life seems to abound in ironies. One telling example is how the conference relates to survivors. This is a Canada moment.

For a variety of reasons, the survivors living in Canada were late in founding their own organization. On Jan. 1, 2001, Gerda Friedberg, the president of the newly founded organization called Jewish Survivors of Canada, wrote a letter to Rabbi Israel Miller, president of the Claims Conference, requesting representation on its board. A reply to the letter was received on Feb. 23, three weeks later, signed by Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president. It stated that the conference was reviewing "its membership structure" and "in the meanwhile," he advised Friedberg to "be in touch with [the Jewish Congress] to share your thoughts, as it is a representative of Canadian Jewry."

The unmistakable inference from this statement is that the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) represents all Canadian Jews and hence also the Jewish survivors, and therefore, survivors' representation would be superfluous. Indeed, it took almost two years before the Canadian survivors received a seat on the conference's board, but only after Jack Silverstone of the CJC relinquished his own. Its first project was to develop a register of survivors in Canada, presumably numbering 14,000, the third largest survivor community in the world. Its requests to the UJA to finance the project dragged on for many months to no avail. Eight months ago, the organization applied for a grant of $28,000 (US) to the conference. As of today, it has received no reply.

And there is another Canada moment that reveals the sensitivity of the conference's officials. Greg Schneider, vice-president of allocations, spoke before an audience of survivors on May 5, 1999. The occasion was the distribution of the Swiss Bank reparations. A major theme of his talk was the need to establish better communications between the conference and the survivors. These praiseworthy sentiments, however, rang hollow as Schneider had a convoluted response to the complaints of several members in the audience about their real estate in Germany being withheld from them by the conference. He also discussed at great length the importance of education, on which the conference spent 20 per cent of its allocations. In a rhetorical flurry, he evoked memory that must be preserved – a plank of the conference's policy.

Encouraged by Schneider's promise to open communication and his enthusiastic endorsement of education about the Holocaust, I wrote him a five-page letter. In the letter, I apprised him of the comprehensive Holocaust education offered at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). I also mentioned the large number of survivors' grandchildren who study at CHAT. The letter also pointed out the possibilities of enlarging the program and extending it to the public high schools, where a large number of Jewish students attend. The letter mailed on May 28, 1999, remained unanswered.

On June 28, I wrote Schneider another letter reminding him of his solemn promise to make the institution more responsive. Only after conference board members intervened on my behalf did he write me a formal letter adorned with bureaucratic platitudes. Attached to it was an application form for a grant. The forms were duly filled out by CHAT's headmaster, Paul Shaviv, sent out without delay, and promptly turned down. The reason for the rejection: "The number of requests for allocations has exceeded our resources."

Which were the more qualified institutions to have received allocations; what were the criteria for receiving them? This basic information was not included in the rejection letter. The lack of funds seems to be a lame excuse in light of the billions of dollars that are accumulating in the conference's coffers, as asserted by Edgar Bronfman, president of the Jewish World Congress and the conference's vice-president.

In the Forward of Jan. 4, 2002, Bronfman stated that "monies unclaimed or unneeded by survivors or their heirs – which may total in the billions of dollars – can be gathered and parcelled to education programs worldwide." Since Bronfman passes over the survivors' predicament, I thought it would be proper to portray a few of these cases.

Leo Rechter, the president of The National Association of Jewish Child Holocaust Survivors (NAHOS), was commissioned to conduct interviews for Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation. While conducting the interviews, he encountered an appalling depth of poverty among survivors.

> ... you can see people scurrying to buy the unsold challot at reduced prices. These are the needy survivors not mentioned in Bronfman's statement

"I met destitute survivors," he writes in the NAHOS newsletter of Dec. 20, 2001, "who lived in walk-up tenements in Washington Heights and in Brooklyn. Some did not even have a decent chair to offer me during the interview."

New York City is no exception. Netty Gross tells a story about an 82-year-old Los Angeles survivor (Jerusalem Report, May 7, 2001), that should put to shame the Claims Conference and its defenders.

"Leon Granowski was a barber in Majdanek. Though ill with heart disease and cancer, Granowski is still cutting hair to make ends meet. Years ago, the conference turned down his application for a reparation pension on the grounds that he'd received a DM 2,000 payment from West Germany."

Michele Gillen's investigative report that aired on CBS News in Miami portrays the dire poverty of survivors in Florida. And as more survivors retire, they plunge even deeper into poverty. Toronto is no different. Just before dusk, on the eve of the Sabbath when the bakeries are about to close, you can see people scurrying to buy the unsold challot at reduced prices. These are the needy survivors not mentioned in Bronfman's statement.

'Fully aware of material deprivation'

The Claims Conference's notables are fully aware of this material deprivation. Roman Kent, a vice-president of the conference, addressed his colleagues at its Nov. 28, 2001 meeting that discussed the allocations of money. He pointed out that the "lack of concern for needy survivors in the Jewish community has left survivors with no choice but to claim every last cent from the compensation funds for basic needs."

Kent himself is not a needy survivor, but he stood for the roll call and trailed on the death march, and he remembers. While others annually evoke the memory of the dead, he remembers those still living.

As the survivor population has aged, the need for a health-care system has increased exponentially. This is as true in Toronto as in Miami, in Montreal as in New York. Attuned to this urgency, the umbrella organizations of the survivors made the demand for establishing a health care system its centrepiece policy. They have advocated this idea since 1998. The American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, for example, met in Washington, D.C., on Feb. 17, 2002, and called on the Claims Conference and other relevant agencies "to devise and implement, without further delay, a health-care system for survivors – which must include home health-care services."

Furthermore, the Gathering also pledged on behalf of the survivors to forgo any compensation or restitution so as to enable it to bring this project to fruition. At its meeting in Miami on Feb. 23, 2002, the umbrella organization of the survivors reinforced this resolution, urging the Claims Conference to avoid further bureaucratic delays.

The State of Florida is home to a large number of aging survivors who have been afflicted with a series of ills. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency of Aug. 29, 2000, reported that a group of South Florida survivors comprising 15,000 people applied to the Claims Conference for financial help to set up a home- care health system. Its purpose, they argued, was to avoid the indignities – as long as possible – of old-age homes. The cost of the system was assessed at $46 million (US) and they requested from the conference seed money of $15 million (US), a paltry sum in comparison to the billions of dollars it has received over the years.

While its two-pronged mandate – its raison d'être – is the welfare of the survivors and education about the Holocaust, the evidence shows that these declarations are honoured more in the breach than in the observance. So where do the enormous sums of money go?

As in the case of CHAT's application, the conference turned down the survivors' request, citing a lack of funds. While its two-pronged mandate – its raison d'être – is the welfare of the survivors and education about the Holocaust, the evidence shows that these declarations are honoured more in the breach than in the observance. So where do the enormous sums of money go?

A 500-page internal report of funds allocations, dated April 25, 2000, indicates the name of the institution, the allocated sum and usually the account number and the name of the bank that made the transaction. Very often, funds are allocated to institutions without an account number, an odd way of dispensing public money. The following is a random sample of allocations:

1. Trust for Planning and Development Services – $315,000, no account number;

2. Amigour, a branch of the Jewish Agency engaged in building affordable housing – $22 million, listed for the purpose of "sheltered housing," acc. no. 70750/88, Bank Leumi (there is a series of account numbers listed);

3. Irgun Olei Merkaz Europa, $15 million, acc. no. 14567/95, Bank Leumi (there is a series of account numbers listed).

The criteria for distribution of funds are shrouded in mystery, a practice that the Claims Conference has elevated to a level of metaphysics. Since it does not provide a rationale for money distribution, I will try here to provide an anti-rationale – that is, why these institutions should not have been funded, except for the trust for planning and service institution whose identity I could not establish, notwithstanding my investigative efforts.

The Jewish Agency is a vestige from the pre-State era that has fulfilled its historical mission and, to the dismay of many Israelis, is still strutting on the national stage. One of the reasons it has not vanished, among other reasons, is that it serves as an asylum for "have-been" and "wannabe" politicians, the former seeking new careers after having lost their seats in the Knesset, the latter gleefully eying the would-be vacant seats in the Knesset, while using the agency as a springboard for their next career move. Are the $22 million (US) given to the agency to pay the salaries of its officials and travel expenses to visit their brethren in the Diaspora? More to the point: What has the Jewish Agency ever done for survivors? When we came en masse to Israel in the '50s and '60s, we were told to buckle up and stop whining. How many clinics did the agency found? How many support groups did it form? In what way did it help the psychologically battered and physically shattered newly arrived immigrant-survivors adjust to the new environment? The answer to these questions is: it didn't. Clearly, the Claims Conference, for political reasons, is infusing enormous amounts of money into an institution that lives off its past and now lives off the money that should go to provide for the needy and elderly survivors. Shame, where art thou?

Irgun Olei Merkaz Europa was originally founded in 1932 to facilitate the absorption of immigrants from Germany that steadily increased when the Nazi party came to power. Later, it absorbed immigrants from Austria and Czechoslovakia. A non-profit organization, the Irgun developed apartment buildings for its members and helped them settle in Palestine. As its membership population aged, the Irgun built old-age homes and administered them. At present, it boasts well-equipped and efficiently managed homes across the country.

Unlike Polish immigrants to Palestine, the Austrian and German immigrants were relatively well-to-do, thanks to a fiscal arrangement between the Jewish Agency and the Nazi government. The German and the Austrian immigrants received generous restitutions from the German government in the '50s for deprivation of citizenship, and most of them enjoy a life pension. In the context of Israeli class stratification, Israeli citizens from Germany and Austria belong to the upper middle class and hardly need financial assistance. Whereas the conference was initially charged to handle cases that have fallen between the cracks, German and Austrian immigrants certainly do not belong in this category.

Of course, it is quite possible that the conference considers them to be survivors for having been targeted for annihilation had they not escaped in time from Germany. Guided by this logic, $72 billion (US) have been allocated to Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union. True, these Jewish refugees spent the war years in Soviet Asia – so the argument goes – and yet they were potential victioms of Nazi persecution. So if I am scheduled to fly out to Miami and I miss the flight and the plane crashes, am I eligible for compensation as a crash victim?

Undoubtedly, there are Jewish communities living in dire poverty in urgent need of help. "Israel is responsible for each fellow Jew," a talmudic slogan has instructed Jews through history. Jewish organizations in North America raised millions of dollars last year and according to Charles Bronfman, private Jewish foundations have assets of $25 billion (US) dollars. Why not earmark some of these funds to help needy Jewish communities, instead of draining the unclaimed restitution funds intended to better survivors' lives? The Claims Conference was not designated to become a Jewish philanthropic organization.

As reported by Netty Gross of The Jerusalem Report, the "conference is in breach of its own 1952 U.S. Article of Incorporation, which states that its mission is to 'voluntarily assist, aid, help, act for and on behalf of Jewish persons who were victims of Nazi persecution.'" So how does this legal clause square with lavishing enormous sums of money on the World Zionist Organization (WZO)?

According to the Claims Conference's internal report, the following are grants given to the WZO:

1. $500,000 (US), acc. no. 11231254-8 – no designated purpose;
2. DM 300,000, acc. no. 2231254-1 – trips;
3. DM 1,095,000, acc. no. 3231254-2 – trips;
4. $900,000 (US), acc. no. 5231254-3 – trips;
5. $4 million (US), acc. no. 8231254-7 – no designated purpose;
6. $5 million (US), acc. no. 9231254-8 – no designated purpose.

Against these lavishly allocated amounts of money, the allocations to Baycrest $15,500 (US) and the Bernard Betel Centre $128,400 (US) are casual, dime-tossing handouts. The Bernard Betel Centre, like Baycrest, serves a large number of survivors, and it offers them a variety of courses in the arts and other therapeutic activities. Surely, the German restitution was intended precisely for the kind of institutions represented by Baycrest and Betel, and not for covering travelling expenses for WZO officials.

"For those [victims] in the final years of their lives, it will provide them with a little more means than they would otherwise have had." Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's statement refers to the establishment of the Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future Foundation on Feb. 16, 1999. The mission of the foundation is to compensate Nazi slave and forced labourers. The German law defines slave labourers as "persons who were compelled to perform work in a concentration camp... a ghetto or a similar place of incarceration under comparable conditions."

According to Yad Vashem's statistics, there were 200,000 Jewish concentration camp and ghetto survivors in 1945. Using actuarial assumptions and methods that are reasonable in aggregate, Andre Knapp, senior actuarial analyst, estimates that of that population, there would have been 46,000 to 65,000 alive in 1955.

Given the physical deprivation and mental brutality that this population was exposed to over a period of two to five years, the survival rate leans toward the lower figure. It is therefore surprising, to use an understatement, that the German branch of the Claims Conference mentions the figure of Jewish concentration camp and ghetto survivors as 400,000, out of whom 135,000 are still alive.

Refuting the allegation that these are manipulated figures, Karl Brozik, director of the conference's German branch, argues that this estimate is "based on four sources, including a German restitution office and an Israeli disability centre." Assuming that Brozik's figures, though defying demographic logic, are correct, how many of the eligible survivors fall under the conference's administrative province? How many cases have been processed so far? Which cases get priority?

These questions are not driven by statistical inquisitiveness. Rather, they are at the heart of the matter, for they have financial ramifications affecting every single slave labour recipient. Since the total amount of the money available is fixed, the amount that each individual receives depends on the number of approved applications. The underhanded way the conference has handled the unclaimed and claimed restitution money gives justifiable rise to suspicion that the slave labour compensation will meet with the same fate.

Sadly, the cabal-like secrecy that has informed the conference for decades continues. Its officials did not even find it necessary to keep us abreast of the process, though we are the process and we are the processed. It sent out a letter whose underlying message was: Don't call us; we'll call you.

Yes, the conference has set up a Web site on the assumption that the elderly survivors are adept at surfing. And therein lies the psychological gulf separating the survivors from conference officials. But even if they were adept at surfing, the survivors would not have found Yair Sheleg's column on the site. In Ha'aretz of June 29, 2001, Sheleg reports that "fifty-one lawyers will receive about $53 million in legal fees for negotiating the Slave-Labour Agreement. New York attorney Melvin Weiss is set to receive some $6.9 million (US). This sum is equal to the amount to be distributed to 1,000 survivors." And there is much more that does not show on the conference's Web site.

Sheleg entitled his article "Profits of Doom," apparently assigning the profiteers and their accomplices to be judged on the Day of Judgment. The survivors, however, cannot wait that long. Time is running out on us at a shocking rate. Action must be taken now. Life's irony is such that justice can be obtained in a German court on German soil. And only there can the survivors find recourse to right a wrong that has been done to them.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5763

5762 was year of terror, turmoil in Israel

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Launched in the shadow of Sept. 11, the Jewish year 5762 was marked for Israel by two developments directly related to those terror attacks: a tightening of ties between Israel and the United States and growing American disaffection with Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat.

Shortly after the planes hit the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, many Americans said they understood how Israelis felt to live in a society threatened by terror. Aside from the immediate emotional identification between the two nations' plights, however, a larger strategic alliance developed in the ensuing months.

In one of the defining policy pronouncements of his early presidency, U.S. President George W. Bush said shortly after Sept. 11 that the international community would be divided between those who supported terrorism and those who opposed it.

Arafat ultimately came down on the wrong side, and paid the price in diplomatic ostracism. The discrediting of Arafat in American eyes was, for Israel, the most significant political development of 5762, and appreciably changed the diplomatic balance between Israel and the Palestinians.

The process of discrediting the Palestinian leader took several months. Sensing the political shift, Arafat on Sept. 19 prudently declared a ceasefire in the intifadah against Israel. If Palestinian attacks on Israel continued, he realized, he risked being branded as a sponsor of terrorism.

Although the ceasefire failed to hold even for a few days, Bush gave Arafat the benefit of the doubt and in early October formally noted America's support for the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

In November, Secretary of State Colin Powell followed this up with a major policy speech in which he called for an end to the intifadah, an end to Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the creation of a viable Palestinian state.

But with the Palestinian terrorist onslaught continuing and even intensifying, American perceptions began to change.

In late November, retired U.S. Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni arrived in Israel as Powell's special envoy, charged with hammering out a ceasefire. Instead, the Palestinians greeted Zinni with a series of terror attacks that, over the course of a single weekend in early December, left 25 Israelis dead and almost 230 wounded. The attacks shattered Zinni's mission.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon held Arafat personally responsible for the attacks.

"He is directly responsible for everything that's happening," Sharon said, "and he is the great obstacle to peace and stability in the Middle East."

A few days later, after an Israeli bus was attacked outside the West Bank settlement of Immanuel on Dec. 12, killing 10 people and wounding 23, the Israeli cabinet issued a statement declaring Arafat "no longer relevant," and severing all contact with him.

Signalling his dismay at the Palestinians, Bush temporarily recalled Zinni, but sent him back to the region in late December.

The decisive shift in Bush's attitude toward Arafat came after Israel, on Jan. 3, seized the Karine-A, a ship purchased by the Palestinians and laden with arms acquired in Iran. The 50-ton cargo included Katyusha rockets, mortars, anti-tank missiles, anti-tank mines, sniper rifles and other munitions.

Arafat repeatedly denied any involvement, and the Americans at first were reluctant to believe that the arms had been purchased on his authority. Within days, however, Israel was able to prove that the arms had been purchased by Fuad Shubaki, a member of Arafat's inner circle whom the Palestinian leader often used as a financial go-between.

By mid-January, the CIA was convinced of Arafat's direct involvement in the arms deal and of his links with Tehran, which formed part of Bush's "Axis of Evil."

Zinni mission suspended

Reportedly livid at the Palestinian leader's lies, Bush several weeks later formally suspended the Zinni mission and announced that he "was disappointed in Arafat." In early February, Powell told the U.S. Senate's Foreign Relations Committee that Arafat "must confront terror and choose peace over violence. He cannot have it both ways."

Still, the administration stopped short of severing ties with the PA leader.

After months of suicide bombings, culminating in the Park Hotel massacre in Netanya on March 27, in which 29 Israelis, mostly elderly, were killed as they sat down to a Passover meal, Israel launched Operation Protective Wall, a major ground offensive designed to crush the Palestinian terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank.

However, when the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) trapped Arafat in his headquarters in Ramallah, Powell crossed the army cordon to meet the Palestinian leader in an abortive attempt to broker a ceasefire.

The invasion of the West Bank ended in controversial standoffs at Arafat's compound and at the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, but Israel did manage to uncover a trove of documents in PA offices clearly proving Arafat's personal involvement in terror.

In early June, Sharon convinced Bush that persisting with Arafat was "a cardinal error." On June 24, in a long-awaited policy speech, Bush appeared to signal the end of the Arafat era, calling on the Palestinians to elect new leaders "not compromised by terror."

The Bush speech was followed by a joint Israeli-U.S. demand for extensive reform of Palestinian political, financial and military institutions. This was a logical outcome of the new insistence on a Palestinian leadership that could be trusted to keep a peace deal that entailed major Israeli concessions. For the Israelis the key demand was reform of the Palestinian security apparatus, in the hope that once this was implemented, the Palestinians would be able – and willing – to control terror.

One of the immediate implications of Arafat's gradual loss of credibility was that Israel was able to take increasingly tough countermeasures against Palestinian violence as the year progressed. When, after the Oct. 17 assassination of Tourism Minister Rechavam Ze'evi in Jerusalem, the IDF moved ground forces into six Palestinian cities, the Americans immediately pressured Israel to withdraw.

The same thing happened soon after Operation Protective Wall was launched in the spring, though that time Sharon rebuffed Bush's call for a speedy withdrawal and kept Israeli troops in place for several weeks.

When, after another wave of terror attacks, Israel moved back into Palestinian cities in mid-July in Operation Determined Path, there was virtually no American protest.

So, too, with Israel's policy of "targeted killings" of known Palestinian terrorists. While at first controversial, the killings elicited less and less criticism as the year progressed – though critics argued that at times they were counterproductive.

After Israel's mid-January killing of Raed Karmi, the head of Arafat's Tanzim militia in Tulkarm and a leading instigator of attacks, Palestinians launched an unprecedentedly ferocious wave of terror that started with a deadly shooting attack on a bat mitzvah celebration in Hadera in mid-January and culminated in the Netanya attack in late March.

Israel, nevertheless, persisted with its targeted killings. In late July the air force assassinated the military chief of Hamas, Saleh Shehadeh, dropping a one-ton bomb on his Gaza apartment and killing at least 14 civilians, including nine children. That attack prompted a wave of international criticism and a new round of Hamas attacks – and, according to some Palestinian sources, undermined chances for at least a partial ceasefire.

Despite growing American support, Israel faced much international, especially European, criticism for its handling of the intifadah. Sharon was castigated in the European press for refusing to allow Arafat to attend Christmas services in Bethlehem or the Arab League summit in Beirut in late March, where

A dark year for European Jewry

By RUTH GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The aftermath of the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States and the continuing Israeli-Palestinian conflict has had a direct and unsettling impact on European Jews.

Most dramatic was the emergence of what some observers called a "new" anti-Semitism, which others saw as a resurgence of traditional Jew-hatred that had been lurking beneath the surface since the Holocaust.

"Anti-Semitism, it has been said, is a light sleeper," the London Jewish Chronicle stated in an editorial this spring. "It began ominously to stir from slumber with the obscenely mistitled UN Anti-Racism Conference in Durban last year; arose further after the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States; and, notably in France and a number of other European states, has leapt fully awake with the escalation of Middle East violence."

Sources contributing to the reawakening included growing Muslim communities, extreme right-wing movements, pro-Palestinian political networks, and what David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, called "the fashionable 'salon' anti-Semitism of some elites."

A poll of 2,500 people in five western European countries, released in June by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL), indicated that 30 per cent of Europeans cling to traditional anti-Jewish stereotypes. In addition, 62 per cent of respondents believed the violence against European Jews over the past year was a result of anti-Israel sentiment.

ADL national director Abraham Foxman blamed anti-Israel sentiment on European governments – specifically on French, Danish and Belgian leaders – who termed the violence in their countries "political" rather than anti-Semitic.

While not all criticism of the Israeli government is anti-Semitic, the current tension linked to the Middle East conflict "rationalizes and legitimizes" acts of violence against Jews, Foxman said.

Attacks against Jews and Jewish institutions in some countries had already risen sharply since the Palestinian intifadah began in September 2000.

Following Israeli incursions into the West Bank this spring, however, isolated incidents intensified into a wave of violent attacks against Jews and Jewish institutions on a scale unseen since the Holocaust.

No one was killed, but synagogues were torched, Jewish cemeteries desecrated and Jews roughed up on the street. The European Jewish Congress counted some 360 anti-Jewish incidents in France in the first three weeks of April alone – mostly acts commited by alienated young Arabs lashing out at Jews and Jewish institutions as surrogates for Israel.

The attacks took place mainly in western Europe, which also saw a marked political shift to the right. In France, Jacques Chirac was re-elected president in a second-round vote, but only after extremist Jean-Marie Le Pen shocked voters by coming in second in the first round.

Anti-Semitic violence was also coupled with a more subtle ideological shift, with pro-Palestinian political sentiment fostering a demonization of Israel and a growing acceptance of classic anti-Semitic rhetoric in public discourse and private conversation.

The left wing, the peace movement and anti-globalization activists adopted a sometimes fiercely pro-Palestinian bias that included calls to isolate Israel with intellectual and commercial boycotts.

"In Italy, anti-Israel and anti-Semitic opinions are spread by local Italians," said Francesco Spagnolo, director of a Jewish music study centre in Milan. "It is ideological, but very vocal. I am very disillusioned."

A year of attacks, isolation, renewal

Jews who felt that many in the European media demonstrated an openly pro-Palestinian bias launched Web sites and letter-writing campaigns to lobby editors.

In April, the non-Jewish Italian journalist Oriana Fallaci entered the fray with a blistering indictment of Italy, Italians, the Catholic Church, the left wing, the media, politically correct pacifists and Europeans in general for abandoning Israel and fomenting a new wave of anti-Semitism.

Published as a cover story in a leading Italian newsweekly, her manifesto began by denouncing an Italian peace march that had degenerated into a vicious display of anti-Israel invective.

"I find it shameful," she wrote, "that in Italy there can be a march of individuals who, dressed as kamikazes, bawl infamous abuse against Israel, brandish photographs of Israeli leaders on whose foreheads they have drawn swastikas, incite the public to hate the Jews."

Fallaci lashed out at the Vatican for fostering a pro-Palestinian bias. She also criticized leftists for forgetting the sacrifices Jews had made in the struggle against fascism, and for becoming opportunistic lackeys to a "stupid, cowardly, dishonest" political correctness.

European Jewish leaders themselves appeared at a loss as to how to combat anti-Semitism and rally mainstream support for Israel.

In the spring, the European Jewish Congress and European Council of Jewish Communities held a strategy session in Brussels and established a European Co-ordination Centre to shape public opinion and lobby governments and parliaments.

Pro-Israel rallies in several cities, including a May rally in Brussels of 10,000 people from across Europe sponsored by the new centre, raised spirits but did not appear to have much success in changing European politics.

"People think Israel is like South Africa was 20 years ago, and that [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon is like [former Yugoslav leader Slobodan] Milosevic," said Joel Rubinfeld, a founder of the Belgian-Israel Friendship Association who helped organize the Brussels rally.

"They are wrong, but I am not angry at those people in the street. I am angry at the media."

Post-Communist countries in eastern and central Europe registered anti-Semitic incidents, but these did not appear to be directly linked to the Middle East. In general, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict did not have such a strong effect on eastern Europe, whose governments and media seemed more pro-Israel.

Other developments, meanwhile, reflected new social, political and cultural realities that are redefining or overturning old models of Jewish identity and behaviour.

While fears for Israel and concern over anti-Semitism drew many Jews closer together, communities were split politically over Israeli government policy toward the Palestinians.

Internally, religious issues and Jewish pluralism were increasingly on the agenda as traditional definitions of Jewishness eroded.

Liberal Jewish groups not generally recognized by the mainstream Orthodox community operated in Italy, Poland, the Czech Republic, Hungary and elsewhere.

Holocaust issues, particularly regarding property restitution and compensation, also remained high-profile.

This was particularly so in eastern and central Europe, where Jewish leaders remained disappointed with efforts to regain communal property, despite their governments' interest in addressing Jewish concerns as they negotiated to join the NATO military alliance and the European Union.

There were attempts across Europe to embrace and promote Jewish culture, both as part of a new, multicultural European reality and as a way of strengthening Jewish identity.

Basilica of St. Francis (San Francesco) of Assisi.

Assisi 2002: An Encounter with History

By GERALD SCHWARTZ

With help and advice from the Instituto di Cultura Italianna in Toronto, I signed up for an intensive course in the Italian language this past spring. Though I had read about the Holocaust experiences of Italy's Jews and the Assisi Underground, I did not expect to have a personal meeting with perhaps the last surviving member of a group that helped save the lives of hundreds of Jews.

These Jews had fled to Assisi mainly from Trieste and other Italian towns in the north and were protected there from September 1943 until June 1944, when they were liberated by the Anglo-American armies. Most were native Italians by birth, but some were refugees from other countries in Europe overrun by the Nazis.

Assisi sits high on a ridge of Mount Subasio, some 100 miles north of Rome in the province of Perugia and region of Umbria. Today, the walled centro storico (historical centre) has only about 1,000 permanent residents, most of whom belong to the clergy. The effects of the massive earthquake five years ago are still in evidence. While overcrowded with tourists during the day, at dawn and dusk the alleyways and cobblestone streets of Assisi are peaceful.

Though the Vatican may have remained officially silent during the Nazi deportation of Jews in Italy, some 85 per cent of Italy's Jews survived due in no small part to the support of the Catholic clergy. Hundreds of Jews were hidden in its enclaves in Rome. One of the earliest rescue attempts unfolded in Assisi, the birthplace of St. Francis (or San Francesco), founder of the Franciscan order. Monsignor Giuseppe Nicolini (Bishop of Assisi), Father Ruffino Niccacci of the Damiano monastery and a young priest named Aldo Brunacci spearheaded the sheltering, feeding and protection of these Jews. Father Brunacci (Don Aldo) was a confidante of Bishop Nicolini and much work, including the hiding and safekeeping of Jewish religious books, was done in absolute secrecy.

By incredible coincidence, both my language school and rented apartment were steps from the Casa Papa Giovanni, which contains Don Aldo's residence. A Greek and Latin classicist, Don Aldo is presently a canon at the San Rufino Cathedral in Assisi and operates a retreat house and bookshop named after Pope John XXIII.

I met with Don Aldo shortly before he left for New York to attend a Shoah conference at Brooklyn College. We ended up speaking for well over an hour in French – his English and my Italian were not fluent enough at this point. Don Aldo is now 88 years old and vigorous in mind, body and spirit. He told me he has visited both Montreal and Toronto.

Up until 1943, no Jews had ever settled in Assisi. Most Italian-born Jews – in the country since pre-Roman times – were assimilated. This fact is depicted in the classic book and film The Garden of the Finzi-Continis by Giorgio Bassani, a Jew from Bologna and Ferrara. (The book, available in every bookshop in Italy, is on many high school reading lists there.)

With the fall of Rome and Northern Italy to the Germans in September of that year, Bishop Nicolini asked Father Niccacci to hide and protect fleeing Jews, which he did, in 26 monasteries and convents in and around the town. Those who could easily pass as Italian were issued false identity cards and taken into private homes of his parishioners with no pay for their lodging. A local printer and his son, Luigi and Trento Brizi, forged false documents, allowing the refugees to pass themselves off as Italians from the southern areas of Italy where the Allies had already landed. Trusted clerics conducted academic classes for Jewish children and also taught Jews to behave as Christians so as not to arouse suspicion.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5763

Eventually, the SS raided the hideouts, but the refugees were able to flee in time into the nearby forests and mountains, escorted by priests and partisans. The Germans arrested Father Brunacci in May 1944, while the Viterbi family of Padua was actually in his home. Held in confinement in Rome, the Vatican intervened to save his life, and he took refuge there until Rome was liberated on June 4, 1944. In the end, not a single Jewish refugee in Assisi was caught, deported or denounced to the Germans.

I was transfixed as Don Aldo showed me his Righteous Medal (chasidei umot ha'olam in Hebrew) and photos of his tree-planting ceremony at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem in 1977. The medallion is inscribed with the famous quote in Hebrew and French: "Whoever preserves one life it is as though he has preserved the entire world."

Don Aldo ensured that Monsignor Nicolini was recognized posthumously. In addition, he recorded his testimony as a rescuer for Stephen Spielberg's Visual History of the Shoah Foundation and showed me a personal letter in Italian from its American director.

After the war, Father Brunacci kept in close touch with the survivors, who were living in Italy, Israel and elsewhere. He spoke fondly of all but made special mention of the Viterbi family, Prof. Emilio Viterbi, a scientist at the University of Padua, his wife Margherita Levi Minzi and their daughters Graziela and Mirjam. Graziela recently returned to Assisi from Rome after the death of her husband but moved the month I was there while her home was being repaired after earthquake damage. One of her sons is a rabbi living in Rome. She is now the only Jewish resident of this town.

Don Aldo has presided at a reunion of the Jews from Trieste in 1955 and presided over a day in 1982 dedicated to the Jews of Italy: Giornata Degli Ebrei D'Italia.

Throughout the German occupation, Don Aldo dealt directly with the German commander of Assisi, Col. Valentin Muller. According to Don Aldo, Muller and Bishop Nicolini were instrumental in keeping Assisi – declared in 1944 a hospital city – immune from bombardment and stationed with military from both sides. When the Germans retreated from Assisi in June 1944, their rear guard abandoned the city without the kind of atrocities and destruction that occurred elsewhere in Italy. The people and art treasures of the city of St. Francis were spared.

Don Aldo made me photocopies of some pertinent Italian documents which also included photos of some of the events mentioned in this article. The definitive book on this period, by Franco Santucci, is called Assisi: 1943-44 Documenti per una storia, which chronicles day-to-day critical events of the time. I bought a short English summary of it called The Strategy That Saved Assisi.

The time I spent with Don Aldo Brunacci was a major highlight of my six weeks in Italy. His modesty and selflessness overwhelmed me. It was an honour to greet him personally. In a time of darkness and destruction, he was one of a small number of people who stood for humanity and justice.

Rosh Hashanah: the birthday of the world

By SHARON KANON
Israel Press Service

"Today is the birthday of the world. Today all creatures of the world stand in judgment..." These are the verses sung each time the shofar is blown during the Rosh Hashanah service.

On the secular calendar, the dates to circle this year are Sept. 7 and 8; on the Hebrew calendar, Tishrei 1, 5763. The first day coincides with the Sabbath, making it a doubly festive event.

How do we know the date? A terse directive was given by God in Emor, Leviticus 23:24, the 31st chapter of the Torah that deals with festivals: "In the seventh month, on the first of the month, there shall be a rest day for you, a remembrance with shofar blasts, a holy convocation." The name Rosh Hashanah is not mentioned.

In the Bible, the Hebrew months are referred to primarily by numbers. Later, when the Mishnah gave Babylonian names to the months, the seventh month was called Tishrei; its root, seru, means "to begin." Coincidently, the agricultural year is also considered to begin at this time, with the fall harvest.

The name Tishrei thus marks a beginning, a new year for establishing dates that occur annually or at annual intervals. Tishrei is also a time of judgment, and the sign of the zodiac associated with Tishrei is a scale, symbolizing judgment.

Rosh Hashanah does not mark the first day of creation. The first day of creation was actually five days earlier, on the 25th day of Elul, in the year 3761 BCE. A universe without humans was not a cause for celebration. Only with the creation of Adam and Eve on the sixth day did the total creation become purposeful and commemorative. The proclamation of God as King, His coronation, takes place on Rosh Hashanah

According to the sages, the patriarchs Abraham and Jacob were also born on Rosh Hashanah. Just as many bad events occurred on Tisha b'Av, so many happy events occurred on Rosh Hashanah. Three barren women (Sarah, Rachel, and Hannah) were made fertile enabling them to bear children – Isaac, Joseph and the prophet Samuel. Jewish slave labour in Egypt stopped on the first day of Tishrei.

The New Year occurs on a rosh chodesh (literally, head of the month), another reason for biblical celebration. All the other festivals fall in the middle of the month.

The name Rosh Hashanah (head of the year), the New Year of Years, was first used by the rabbis in the Mishnah.

When Ezra, on his return from Babylon in the fifth century CE, read out the law to the people on the first day of Tishrei, it also became known as the Day of Judgment. Aware of their shortcomings, the people were in despair, until Nehemiah emphasized the positive side of the festival: "Go your way, 'eat rich viands, and drink the sweet beverages, and send portions to him who has none prepared; for this day is holy to our Lord; do not be sad; for joy in the Lord is your refuge." (Nehemiah 8:120)

Thanks to Nehemiah, we celebrate and enjoy Rosh Hashanah even as we stand in awe of its message. Human beings are judged as individuals and as part of a group, as individual "sheep" and as a "flock."

In the Mussaf prayer, we chant these words: "On Rosh Hashanah it will be inscribed and on Yom Kippur it will be sealed how many will pass from the earth and how many will be created; who will live and who will die... who will rest and who will wander... who will be impoverished and who will be enriched, who will be degraded and who will be exalted."

We are granted a 10-day period in which we can appeal our fate

If we read on, however, we find that we are granted a 10-day period in which we can appeal our fate (which has been written but is not yet permanent). The liturgy gives three specific ways to avert the decree: "Repentance, prayer and charity remove the evil of the decree!"

In other words, we can change our fate, start a clean slate and begin anew.

The process of tshuvah (repentance) begins during Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah, when the Slichot prayers are said asking forgiveness; it continues during the 10 days before Yom Kippur.

The three main themes of Rosh Hashanah are God's kingship, remembrance (of the covenant and the sacrifice of Isaac) and the shofar. The shofar heralds the day as the anniversary of God's coronation as king. The shofar, a ram's horn (a symbol of mercy, a reminder of the ram offered by Abraham instead of Isaac) is blown 100 times each day (6 x 10 plus 40 at the end of the daily service) during the two-day festival. This year, it will not be blown on the first day of Rosh Hashanah, as it falls on the Sabbath.

The first and the last shofar blasts are long and strong, like the sound that accompanied the revelation at Sinai, while the middle notes are short, sad and somber, expressing trepidation in the process of judgment.

"There is definitely a dual nature to the holiday," says Phil Chernofsky, educational director and Torah Tidbits editor for the Orthodox Union Israel Centre in Jerusalem. "Fortunately, though, the last note sets the tone for a triumphant march into the New Year."

IDF developments last year

New Israeli army chief of Staff, Lieutenant-General Moshe Ya'alon (R) and outgoing Chief of Staff, Lieutenant-General Shaul Mofaz (C) are welcomed by army Generals at the Defence Ministry at army headquarters in Tel Aviv on July 9. Ya'alon took over as the 17th Israeli army's chief of staff, replacing Shaul Mofaz who has overseen Israel's response to a 21-month-old Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Arab countries endorsed Saudi plan

Arab countries endorsed a Saudi initiative for "normal" relations with Israel in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal to its pre-1967 borders.

But the heaviest criticism came after a heated early April battle in the Jenin refugee camp, where Palestinians claimed a "massacre" had taken place with several hundred to several thousand victims. Though Israel said only some 52 Palestinians – most of them armed fighters – had been killed, the massacre claim gained credence around the world.

Israel initially agreed to allow a UN Security Council team come to Jenin to investigate the Palestinian claims, but later reversed its stand when the UN's refusal to address Israeli concerns led some to conclude Israel was being set up for condemnation by a biased jury.

In July, a UN report dismissed the massacre claims, but criticized the IDF for allegedly not allowing humanitarian aid to reach Palestinians for several days.

The Jenin battle also coincided with calls throughout Europe to boycott Israeli goods and end contact with Israeli academics and other professionals. Such calls made little progress, but anti-Israel media, anti-Israel demonstrations throughout the continent and an outbreak of anti-Semitic attacks tied to the intifadah showed how low Israel had fallen in Europe's estimation.

The intifadah took an enormous economic toll on both Israel and the Palestinians. On the Palestinian side, economic activity ground to a halt and food supplies grew scarce when Israel imposed long curfews on Palestinian cities to curb terrorist movements.

On the domestic political front, the Labor Party remained in disarray as it struggled to find a leader and many members called on the party to leave Sharon's national unity government. Defense Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer bested Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg in a disputed election for party chairman, but was expected to face additional opposition when Labor held yet another leadership vote in November.

For a time it seemed that longtime Labor politico Haim Ramon would challenge Ben-Eliezer in November.

In August, however, Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna, a former general whose initial interviews suggested strongly left-wing views, emerged as a potential challenger.

More ferment was evident on the two fringes of the political spectrum. In March, the far-right National Unity-Israel, Our Home bloc deserted the unity government because it felt Sharon was not being tough enough on Palestinian terror.

On the left, more dovish elements of the Labor Party and some leaders of the Meretz Party debated breaking away to form a new left-wing movement that would focus on social justice and seek to revive the peace process with the Palestinians.

On the religious front, the Orthodox Shas Party threatened to withdraw from the government in May unless Sharon met its funding demands at a time when the government was facing severe budget cuts. Unlike previous prime ministers, who largely gave in to Shas' demands, Sharon stared them down, firing the Shas ministers and allowing them back into the government only when they agreed to vote for his budget.

Yet for many Israelis, political intrigue and realignment seemed an abstract concern in 5762; the main priority merely was to stay alive.

Some pinned their hopes on the construction of a security fence that Sharon approved in June along Israel's convoluted border with the West Bank. But others warned that in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, not even good fences would make good neighbours.

The Jews of China

By BEVERLEY STERN

I remember the day I was at the Beth Hatefutsoth Museum of the Diaspora in Israel, and I caught a fascinating glimpse of a model of the Kaifeng Synagogue of China. It raised many questions about the mysterious presence of Jews in that country.

This past spring, I had the opportunity as part of a group of 30 Jews from Ontario and Quebec to remove the veil of mystery and see "China through Jewish Eyes." Over 18 days of travel, led by Jewish community leader Harriet Morton, we saw sites of Jewish life in three major centres – Kaifeng, Shanghai and Beijing.

What emerged was an astonishing history of more than 1,000 years of a rich Jewish communal experience that, free of the anti-Semitism of Christian Europe, welcomed Jews, esteemed their values of family, community, education, hard work and success, and allowed them to rise to dazzling heights of prosperity and prominence.

Arriving as merchants in approximately the eighth century, Jews established their first permanent community in Kaifeng over the 11th to 13th centuries. They were followed in the 1830s by Sephardi Jewish entrepreneurs; at the turn of the century, by Russian Jews fleeing pogroms; and from 1933 to 1941, by 30,000 desperate Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi Europe.

Remarkably, the latter were accepted without Chinese visas by the Chinese consulate in Vienna at a time when, with few exceptions, doors to Jews were closed around the world.

While most Jews left China in the years after the Chinese Communist takeover – particularly after the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s – a new influx began arriving from Israel, North America and Europe with the liberalization of the Chinese economy and the establishment of diplomatic ties with Israel.

Archeological discoveries reveal that Jews, many from Persia, first came to China as merchants, often in dusty camel caravans, along the Silk Road as well as by sea and coastal areas. The descendants of those merchants formed the first permanent Jewish community in Kaifeng.

The story of the once-thriving Kaifeng Jewish community, with a population of about 4,000 to 5,000 by the 15th and 16th centuries, is a model of prosperity, assimilation, intermarriage – and ultimately, disappearance.

Drawings and prints in a mini-museum in Kaifeng reveal Jews of the time wearing Chinese garb and to be flourishing and influential in Chinese political and social circles. They intermarried, changed their names and absorbed Chinese traditions. By the late 17th century, they had lost contact with the Jewish world outside. The Kaifeng synagogue and the once-vibrant religious traditions and communal life it inspired lay in ruins.

Interestingly, a new chapter of Kaifeng Jewry might now be written. Moshe Zhang, a Kaifeng Jew with purely Asian features, is one of about 100 or more Kaifeng Jews currently striving to reclaim their Jewish heritage. A small group, including Moishe, hold Friday and Shabbat services (but observe no other religious traditions) and meet with curious visiting Jews from abroad such as ours. Moishe's son, Shi Lei, is now studying Hebrew and Jewish history at Bar-Ilan University on a scholarship.

Unlike Kaifeng Jewry, the Jews of Shanghai sustained a strong, vital Jewish life right up until the time they left for Hong Kong and places further abroad in the wake of huge losses of property during the Japanese occupation, the subsequent Chinese Civil War and the Communist victory over the Nationalists in 1949.

Similarly to Kaifeng Jews, however, Sephardi Jews, many from Baghdad, Bombay and Singapore, first came to Shanghai as merchants seeking their fortunes. They amassed their initial wealth during the years of the forced legalization of the opium trade on China by Britain and other European powers. They later parlayed this wealth into huge fortunes in real estate, manufacturing and trade.

Many of the most striking hotels, apartment towers and commercial buildings in the architecturally beautiful Bund district of Shanghai were built by the Sassoons, Hardoons and Kadoories and other Sephardi Jews.

Besides building mansions and villas with lush gradens and tennis courts, the Sephardim generously supported Jewish causes and Zionism and built syngogues, Jewish schools and community centres.

Unlike the affluent Sephardim who came for trade, impoverished Russian Jews came to China fleeing the vicious anti-Semitism of the late 19th century and the turmoil of the revolutions of 1905 and 1917; they arrived in the thousands, initially eking out a living in Harbin, Shanghai and other cities.

In time, however, these Ashkenazim viewed China as their "second homeland." They also succeeded in business, surpassed the Sephardim in numbers, actively promoted education and the creative arts in music, drama and ballet and demonstrated a vigorous commitment to their faith, community and Zionism. Particularly supportive of Vladimir Jabotinsky's Revisionists, they formed Betar units, including one naval unit that joined the British forces in 1941.

During World War II, when about 30,000 Jewish refugees fled Nazi Europe and were given sanctuary in Shanghai, Rabbi Meir Ashkenazi miraculously escaped with some 50 students from the famed Mir Yeshiva. Many one-time Russian residents can still vividly recall

> Impoverished Russian Jews who fled anti-Semitism and came to China viewed the country as their second homeland

Passover seders led by Rabbi Ashkenazi, who became the spiritual leader of the Ohel Moishe Synagogue and the Russian Jewish community in Shanghai.

Life for Jewish refugees still living in Shanghai changed sharply when the German Gestapo arrived in July 1942. The Gestapo put heavy pressure on the Japanese authorities to impose the Final Solution. But according to one of the trip's participants who lived in Shanghai during the war, they refused the Gestapo's request because of Jewish communal pressure, particularly from Russian "balabatim" (some said that money crossed a few hands).

Instead of the Final Solution, the Japanese occupation authorities proclaimed a "Designated Area for Stateless Refugees," and the 25,000 refugees were moved into a crowded ghetto where they remained for the rest of the war. Living under rigid travel, curfew and work restrictions, they survived by learning new trades in carpentry and sewing often taught by ORT as well as opening small businesses, professional offices and restaurants. (ORT is an international Jewish agency promoting education and trades. Its name was coined in 1880 from the acronym of the Russian words Obschestvo Remeslenovo i zemledelcheskovo Trouda, meaning the Society for Trades and Agricultural Labour.)

Of this remarkable chapter in Jewish-Chinese relations, noted Chinese academic and author of The Jews in China, Pan Guang writes: "Like Schindler,Wallenberg and Sugihara, the name 'Shanghai' has become synonymous with 'rescue' and 'haven' in the annals of the Holocaust."

While only now there is a growing public awareness about China's role in saving Jews during the Holocaust, little is known about the individual Jews who helped China to resist the Japanese invasion and occupation — or those who, believing in the Communist cause, stayed on after the People's Republic was established in 1949.

These idealists, who believed in building a new Communist China, provided valuable services as doctors, political advisors, teachers and scholars. Only after the years of terror and repression launched by the Cultural Revolution in 1966 did most, if not all, the remaining Jews leave.

The current re-appearance of Jews on the mainland follows the expansion of foreign trade and investment in China and the establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and China in 1992.

A wonderful Friday night service and dinner with a small Beijing Reform congregation is a microcosm of the revival of Jewish life in China. Men and women from around the world, including Israel and the United States, have come to this country to study, work with the Jewish community here or to advance their careers.

The number of Jews in China today is about 7,000; 6,000 in Hong Kong, 200 in Shanghai; 200 in Beijing and 200 elsewhere. Diplomats, technology experts, professionals, entrepreneurs and students, they are forging new institutions of communal and religious life, from the secular and Reform to Lubavitch. The latter just opened a new Jewish community centre in Shanghai that is meant to serve the whole Jewish community regardless of affiliation.

Significantly, the return of onetime Chinese Jewish residents as both visitors and investors is compelling testimony to the harmonious relationship and mutual respect Jews and Chinese have enjoyed for over 1,000 years.

Beverley Stern is a writer living in Toronto.

A PRIMARY REFRESHER COURSE: Israel's Prime Minister Arial Sharon dropped in at a first grade class at the Ben Zvi Primary School in Ramle at the start of the school year last week. Israel consulate spared

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Staff at the Israeli consulate and Montreal's Jewish community are thrilled that the consulate here will stay open after all.

Bowing to extraordinary pressure from the Jewish community – as well as to a call from Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham – the Israeli government notified the consulate Sept. 2 that it would not close.

"We're very happy," said Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital. "We're happy for all our friends. It's a good day for the Jewish community and all our friends in Quebec."

The decision, which came as the consulate was literally packing its bags, brought a collective sigh of relief.

Two weeks ago, a New York official from Israel's Finance Ministry visited the consulate to take inventory and prepare the paperwork for closure, which was expected to take place around the High Holy Days.

Out of eight Israeli diplomatic missions slated for closure, two others – in Marseille, France, and Minsk, Belarus – were also spared.

Meanwhile, the Jewish community of Sydney, Australia, said it would be willing to pay to keep Israel's consulate open there. The offer was made by the head of the Australian Zionist Federation in Israel, Frank Stein, in a letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israel Radio reported last week.

Libya wants nuclear weapons

U.S., Israel agree

By ZE'EV SCHIFF and NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The United States agrees with Israeli assessments that Libya has renewed its efforts to acquire a nuclear bomb, and that those efforts have been stepped up since 1999 when UN sanctions on the country were removed.

Analysis

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last week that Libya is energetically seeking to develop a nuclear weapon. Israel believes Libya is trying to acquire fissionable material for nuclear weapons through centrifuges, but that it is a slow process. Experts say Libya may be cooperating with North Korea and Pakistan in the effort.

Sharon mentioned the same assessment, though he also raised the possibility that the Libyans are getting aid from Iraqi experts. He told media interviewers that it's possible Libya will achieve nuclear status before Iraq.

The News in Brief

Canada

Link Eliminated

TORONTO — A link from the University of Toronto's Web site to a petition denouncing Israeli army "atrocities" and "crimes against humanity" during Israel's incursion into the West Bank last spring was removed late last month in response to a complaint by B'nai Brith Canada. The group had been protesting the pro-Palestinian petition linked from the official site of U of T's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE). The petition is preceded by an April 29 letter from Sherene Razack, director of OISE's Centre for Integrative Anti-racism Studies, urging academics to sign it.

Degrees Conferred

TORONTO — Nine Ontarians were among those receiving bachelor's degrees at Yeshiva University's 71st annual commencement exercises. The nine were Hamilton resident Michelle Ross and Toronto-area residents Hadassa Rutman, David Spindel, Jacob Morris Younger, David Samuel Sandel, Robert Lipman Salamon, Daniel Hershtal, Lea Kapustin and Nassi Figdor.

Israel

Dead Sea Water Plan

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan have agreed to lay a pipeline to refill the Dead Sea. Under the plan, reached last week at the UN conference on sustainable development in Johannesburg, South Africa, water would be sent from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea, which has been shrinking. Funds for the plan, which could cost up to $1 billion (US), would come from the World Bank.

'Lost Tribe' Arrives

JERUSALEM — Ninety-five members of a group from northeast India that claims to be a lost tribe of ancient Israel have arrived in Israel. The B'nai Menashe claim they are descended from the biblical tribe of Menashe. The contingent that arrived last week will study Hebrew and Judaism before undergoing formal conversion to Judaism. With the group's arrival, there are 700 B'nai Menashe living in Israel.

World

Alleged Nazi Guard

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Justice Department is seeking to revoke the citizenship of a New Jersey man because of his alleged wartime activities. Andrew Kuras, 80, is charged with obtaining his U.S. citizenship illegally in 1951 by concealing his service as an armed guard at three Nazi slave labour camps. The department's Nazi-hunting unit, the Office of Special Investigations, says Kuras told U.S. immigration officials that he was a farmer during the war.

LAX Terror Probe

NEW YORK — The FBI says it has viewed the July 4 shooting attack at the El Al ticket counter at Los Angeles International Airport as a possible terrorist incident "from day one." The agency said that while it refused to make this assessment public after the shooting, which killed two people, the focus has always been on terrorism. The FBI wrote to Democratic Congressman Eliot Engel that the case is being viewed as an open "terrorism investigation."

Shoe Name Outcry

LONDON — After a complaint by the Simon Wiesenthal Center, the British arm of U.S.-based sportswear maker Umbro apologized last month for giving a pair of shoes the same name as the poison gas used to kill Jews during the Holocaust. An Umbro spokesperson said it was an "unfortunate coincidence" that its Zyklon shoe, on sale since 1999, bore the name of Zyklon B. He said the $30 (US) shoe would be renamed or withdrawn. He wouldn't say whether shoes already shipped would be recalled.

Clothes Removed

NEW YORK — The U.S. department store chain Target is removing clothes with symbols that are code for "Heil Hitler." Store officials said they were unaware the "eight eight" and "88" on the baseball caps and shorts are used by white supremacists to indicate "Heil Hitler," because H is the eighth letter of the alphabet.

Mason Backtracks

NEW YORK — Jewish comic Jackie Mason has denied he cancelled a comedian slated to open for him last month because he is Palestinian. Mason did admit that the fact Ray Hanania advertised their different backgrounds made him "furious." But Jyll Rosenfeld, Mason's wife and manager, was quoted earlier as saying Mason "does not feel comfortable having a Palestinian open for him."

Israel Deports Bomber's Relatives to Gaza

JERUSALEM — Israel moved two relatives of a Palestinian terrorist from the West Bank to Gaza last week.

Intissar and Kifah Ajouri, who were accused of helping their brother Ali Ajouri plan a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, entered Gaza via the Netzarim Crossing.

The sister and brother had been expected to be brought to the Erez Crossing, but the army declared it a closed military zone and then dropped them elsewhere. Israel gave each of them 1,000 shekels ($212 US) in relocation money.

The move came one day after Israel's High Court of Justice approved the siblings' deportation.

The court referred to the army's actions against the pair as a "relocation" rather than a deportation, saying the Palestinian areas in the West Bank and Gaza should be regarded as a single entity.

Ali Ajouri planned the July 17 double suicide bombing near Tel Aviv's old central bus station that killed five people. Israeli troops killed him in a recent operation.

Raising awareness key to resolving problems

This is the first in a series on drug addiction in the Jewish community.

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS) has just launched a teen program to help young addicts and their families in their search for recovery.

The program, which was created to provide support to Jewish teens with drug and alcohol dependencies, was launched on Sept. 11.

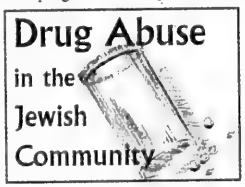
"Kids as young as 14 years old walk into JACS with problems of addiction," JACS executive director Marla Goldman told The CJN in an interview in her Sheppard Street office. "Some have been using ecstacy, hash, grass, cocaine, heroin."

When these children or members of their families realize that drugs or alcohol have taken over their lives, and they want help, the JACS phone number plastered on billboards around the city all of a sudden becomes meaningful.

Founded in Toronto in April 2000, the voluntary self-help group often becomes the first step on the tumultuous road to recovery, Goldman said.

JACS now receives up to 200 calls a month and the regular Thursday night support group is sometimes standing-room-only.

The group's first step is to help alcoholics, addicts, families and friends break through the barrier of denial. From there, they are directed to other facilities and programs, such as detox centres to help them overcome physical dependencies or rehabilitation programs to help them lead more productive lives. Others may join smaller support groups at JACS that meet at different times.



Throughout the process, JACS facilitates meetings and contacts with mentors and friendly voices, Goldman said.

She added that JACS allows for interaction between those who are beginning their recovery with former addicts who have been clean and sober for years. Families with children on the street can befriend and take comfort from addicts who have been there, have recovered and are now mentoring others.

For Goldman, raising awareness is the key to resolving the problem of teen addiction in the Jewish community. She would like to see educational programs run in every school and camp in this city.

"The Jewish community is living in denial," she said. "When a problem like this occurs, they take it and sweep it under the carpet."

There is an impression that alcohol and drugs are a "goyish" problem, JACS-Toronto chairperson Neville Smith said. Some members of our community feel that the Jewish people - Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and secular – are held up to higher standards.

However, addiction, like cancer, is a disease that doesn't discriminate, Smith said.

Studies show that "the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse is the same in the Jewish community as in society at large – about 10 per cent." With a Jewish population in Toronto of about 200,000, there could be 20,000 addicts suffering in this city alone. The number of people affected could be much greater when you take into account all the family members and friends involved, Smith said.

Drug abuse and alcoholism among observant Jews is neither less nor more than in any other community, lawyer and JACS board member Chuck Rotenberg said.

He said part of the JACS mission is to offer "protocols for addiction treatment programs to remove barriers for observant Jews" where denial might be especially difficult to overcome.

Let's help authors

Books are the focus of this column. I wish to draw readers' attention to two books, each of which, in uniquely profound ways, is an affirmation of life.

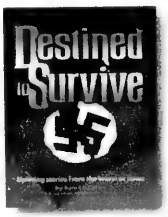
Destined to Survive, by Israel Cohen, Mesorah Publications Ltd., is an evocative, poignant anthology/chronology of personal, mostly Holocaust-related vignettes. Remarkably, given the time, the place and the subject matter they depict, the stories are neither bleak nor lachrymose.

Cohen writes deftly, with a light, descriptive touch. At times, his style is reminiscent of I.B. Singer. For example, in the first story, Jewish Life in Poland Before World War One, Cohen describes the ambience of the open-air market in his shtetl of Brezezin: "The farmers' wives were sitting on small low stools next to their bushels of cherries and onions. Some of the women had scales hanging from poles and others had measuring cups to measure their blueberries and beans. There were chickens in cages on top of the wagons, and the customers would feel them all over and blow the feathers on their backs in order to ascertain their bulk. Butchers frequented the marketplace in order to pick out cows and calves for the slaughterhouses. Everyone was forever haggling over prices. Only a fool would pay the asking price of anything."



The stories paint a richly detailed portrait of the life of a humane, gentle, thoughtful Holocaust survivor, who is keenly aware of the sense of the duty he owes to his forebears and to his descendants.

"Even though it is my personal story," Cohen writes in the foreword, "it represents the story of the thousands of Sruliks and Cohens who suffered a similar fate. Let it be a testimony for generations to come...

"I hope that my writing will inspire and remind others that we are constantly in the hands of the Almighty and that He guides us and provides us with the capacity to be good."

Eskimos of Jerusalem and Other Extraordinary Israelis by Sam Orbaum is a collection of nearly 120 of the columns the author wrote for the Jerusalem Post between 1997 and 2000. Orbaum is an incisive writer whose humour and human interest columns have been a key marker in the literary/journalistic landscape of Israel.

A former Montrealer, Orbaum combines his superb skills as a listener/observer with an economic, sarcastic, sometimes even sardonic writing style.

Published last year in co-operation with the Jerusalem Post, the book brings under one cover "the gems" of the Not Page One columns that appeared in the Post. In that column, Orbaum celebrated the incomparable diversity of the vast, differing array that comprise the people of Jerusalem.

His column was not about "celebrities," the people who "would likely be found on page 1." (Hence the title of the original columns.) Orbaum selected "uplifting, entertaining stories" for the book.

The result is a work that is tearful, happy, poignant, whimsical, light and heavy. It amuses, it saddens; it entertains, it informs.

The wide range of Orbaum's subjects is impossible to encapsulate. Suffice to say, he writes about a gloriously uncategorizable mélange of people and places and situations, the unifying thread binding all of them being their connection to Jerusalem.

When the news emanating from Israel is so consistently negative, Orbaum's book is like a restorative balm upon an aching wound.

To try to mitigate the literary, cultural, academic and social isolation being imposed these days on Israeli writers and scholars, The CJN announces a special Book Review Project.

Beginning with the last issue of October and then in the last issue of every month, we shall showcase a book written by an Israeli writer.

It is our hope that CJN readers will thereby be encouraged to read the book as well, and discuss it in book review clubs or parlor groups or other such discussion groups established in synagogues or neighbourhood friendship circles. The main purpose would be to generate broader public interest in the works featured in the paper.

The books should be available locally in Jewish or other bookstores. Heightened demand for the books reviewed would, of course, be beneficial to the authors, their publishing houses and local booksellers.

The Book Review Project will not replace reviews of works by other, non-Israeli writers, which will continue unabated in the pages of The CJN as part of the high priority we attach to encouraging "Jewish" writing and reading. Indeed, our decision to undertake the project springs from and even enhances that priority.

During these difficult times, Israeli writers, in particular, must receive some of that encouragement. This project attempts to provide it.

The project, however, is only a partial effort at breaking through the brazenly- discriminatory "quarantine" of Israel and Israelis. To be successful, it will require the involvement of as many readers as possible. We hope a great number of people take part.

Intermarriage may preclude membership at shul

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Until he turned 30, Jordan Potasky was eligible to buy tickets for High Holy Day services at Adath Israel Congregation as the child of a member.

Last year he was distressed to learn that neither he nor his young children could attend services at the synagogue that his mother and late father joined more than 20 years ago.

Potasky, a lawyer, was told that because he was married and over 30, he would have to take out a family membership. He was also told that he couldn't do that because his wife is not Jewish.

His children, however, are Jewish. Adath Israel's spiritual leader, Rabbi Steven Saltzman, was part of the beit din that converted them, Potasky told The CJN.

When contacted last week, Rabbi Saltzman declined to discuss his synagogue's policy on membership for Jews with non-Jewish spouses.

Adath Israel president Mark Alter said he was not prepared to talk about specific cases, but confirmed that Adath Israel's policy mandates that all members must be Jewish and that in the case of married couples, both spouses must be members. The policy is under review and was expected to be resolved "probably some time after yontif."

At least two cases – Potasky's and that of David Cohen – are being discussed. Cohen, a member since the 1970s, says he was told earlier this year that he could not renew his membership after it came to the synagogue's attention that his wife of three years is not Jewish.

Cohen, who does not have children, said that, as an alternative, he was offered High Holy Day tickets but not to the main sanctuary where the rest of his family worships.

Eventually, Cohen, who works for a bank in large corporate lending, was able to pay his membership dues and obtain an unrestricted ticket, but said his case is still under consideration. "I'm extremely unhappy with the policy. I think it's exclusionary and doesn't consider the evolving world."

> 'Policy doesn't consider evolving world'

He is, however, "quite happy" that his voice has been heard and the policy is being reviewed, he said.

Of the seven Toronto-area synagogues affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Adath Israel is the only one that does not allow intermarried Jews to take out membership.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, said there is no regional policy on the issue and that it's a matter of synagogue policy and individual rabbinic decision. United Synagogue policy does preclude non-Jews from synagogue membership, however.

Halachically, Rabbi Tanenbaum noted, there is no such thing as intermarriage. Under Jewish law, only a Jewish marriage is recognized.

At Rabbi Tanenbaum's synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation, non-Jewish partners receive complimentary High Holy Day tickets if they would like to attend services. At other local Conservative synagogues, non-member tickets may be purchased for non-Jewish spouses.

In the Reform movement, membership policy also depends on the synagogue, said Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

"Some will give a family membership with full voting rights. At others, only the Jewish partner is the voting partner," she said, adding that a non-Jew cannot join a synagogue on his or her own.

At Orthodox synagogues, it is "fairly common but not universal" to allow the Jewish spouse of an intermarried couple to become a member, according to Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah. His assessment is based on conversations with his Orthodox colleagues, but he was not speaking on behalf of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, of which he is secretary.

At Rabbi Tradburks' synagogue, intermarried Jews may obtain membership and non-Jewish spouses are welcome to attend services and participate in events, he said. For the High Holy Days, the main sanctuary is filled to capacity with members, but a non-Jewish spouse may buy a ticket for auxiliary services.

Synagogues that do not grant membership for intermarried Jews may have based their policy – particularly in years past – on the view that by granting membership, they may be "opening the door to intermarriage," said Rabbi Tradburks.

Denying membership to intermarried Jews is "wrong-headed," Potasky believes.

"I don't think that's the right road for the synagogue to take when Judaism is in danger. Here is a chance for someone who does care to try to keep his family close to the synagogue."

Both Cohen and Potasky say that their faith and religious beliefs are the same as before they married. Potasky said he used to think he would never marry someone who wasn't Jewish, but he met his wife and fell in love "without in any way disavowing my Judaism.

"I'm not super-observant," he said, "but there's a certain minimum I feel I ought to do – [including] raising my kids Jewish, and attending High Holiday services."

Ashkenaz Festival delights the crowd

Israel Is For Kids

Amusement parks, castles, fortresses and just plain fun. Israel is truly a country with kids in mind. There are hundreds of ways for families to explore and enjoy their Jewish homeland. Here are just some attractions that are sure to fill your child, and yourself, with wonder.

Biblical Zoo, Jerusalem
Stretching 62 acres on the southern edge of Israel's capital, the zoo allows children to meet both biblical animals and endangered species from around the globe. How can you pass up the Nile crocodile, Persian fallow deer, and Asian elephant? The zoo also houses its fair share of traditional guests such as lions, tigers, and bears.

Amazing World, Eilat
Experience a spectacular journey through time in this unique "edutainment" complex, the first of its kind in the world, against the beautiful backdrop of Israel's Red Sea resort. Appealing to all five senses, the facility uses hi-tech effects and moving platforms to transport visitors from creation to the dinosaur era to outer space and beyond.

Manara Cable Car, Hula Valley
Climbing at a 43-degree angle, Israel's longest cable car ride transports passengers to the top of northern Israel's majestic Manara Cliff. If the magnificent view of the Hula Valley below isn't enough to excite your youngster, try rappelling, wall climbing, mountain biking or the roller coaster on site.

Belvoir – This ancient Crusader fortress will provide kids with both a history lesson and a beautiful view. Restored through recent excavations, the fortress rises 500 meters above the Jordan Valley, overlooking the winding Jordan River.

The lesson that seems to have been lost

The passage of time will always dull, somewhat, the serrated, jagged edges of pain. It is one of the mind's allies for self-preservation and emotional equilibrium, an invisible hand that waves across the human psyche as memory washes even the deepest wounds of the senses.

But in relation to the mind's intellect, the passage of time can be quite capricious. It can be a foe as much as an ally, blurring the edges of understanding rather than sharpening them, a gauze that distorts the images of the past, rather than a lens that brings them into clearer focus, the invisible hand that points to wishful thinking rather than to perspective and truth.

If the results of an Ipsos-Reid poll regarding Canadians' attitudes to the events of Sept. 11, 2001, are to be believed, it is apparent that, with the passage of a year, the outlines of what happened on that fateful day have become so blurred as to have become the images of something altogether distinct from the truth.

The poll was commissioned by the Globe and Mail and CTV and released by them with great news-making fanfare last weekend on the front page of the newspaper and as the lead item on the network's national news. It found that 69 per cent of 1,003 people polled believed that "the United States, with its policies and actions, [bore] some responsibility for the terrorist attacks against them." Fully 15 per cent of the individuals polled believed that the United States bore all the responsibility for the attacks.

We ought not to put too much stock in the accuracy of the poll. It can be interpreted in a number of ways and is likely more reflective of current ambivalent Canadian feelings toward Saddam Hussein – although that too would be problematic – rather than of past, less equivocal feelings toward Osama bin Laden and his Al Qaeda network. Indeed in the Globe and Mail article, John Wright, vice-president of Ipsos-Reid, made that very point.

Nevertheless, even as an undifferentiated, broad, brush-stroke finding, the poll is troublesome in its own right and for what it may portend about Canadians' understanding of, let alone support for, the justice of Israel's cause in the conflict with the Palestinian leadership.

But this week at least, we should place on a lesser level our concerns for Canadians' understanding of the Middle East conflict. The anniversary of 9/11 calls on our conscience and beckons our behaviour more.

But it is inconceivable, even deeply offensive nevertheless, as we recall that day one year ago this week, as we pay respect to the thousands who were killed, as we reflect upon the implications of the atrocity and as we reinvigorate our resolve to fight the fanatics of terrorism, that so many Canadians, in effect, at least partially seem prepared to exonerate the murderers of culpability for their hideous, evil crime.

Is it possible that the lesson of that horrible day may have been lost, or worse, not learned at all?

Speaking peace

During the High Holy Days, a time for reflection and for opening of the heart, we members of the Jewish community look to a future in which all children can live in harmony in a world treated with sanctity. At present, we are deeply saddened by the ongoing loss of life and loss of hope for peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

For almost two years we have witnessed the two peoples trapped in a cycle of murderous retaliation. In the last several months, both sides have plummeted further into grief and carried out new acts of brutality.

As Jews, we identify and mourn with our besieged people in these sad and fearful times. Yet, as do many Israelis, we have profound reservations about the Sharon government, whose heavy-handed militarism has caused suffering and death without offering feasible options for peace. There is hope among women and men who are working at the grassroots level for justice and reconciliation.

Though numerous actions of the Israeli government deserve rebuke, we are disturbed by the harsh rhetoric of many of Israel's critics. They bear responsibility for the current increase in anti-Semitic violence and hatred. We likewise decry the murderous tactics employed by some Palestinians. Attacks on Israeli civilians cannot be justified. That said, we acknowledge that the Palestinian people have cause to struggle for dignity and human rights. The Israeli occupation degraded them both spiritually and physically. Jewish tradition reminds us that God is with the oppressed, even when they are in the wrong (Midrash Leviticus Rabba 27:5 and parallels).

Most importantly, we call for an end to violence on all sides. We say clearly and emphatically to terrorists, warmongers and oppressors that their actions will not be supported in any way. Violence and war have traumatized and degraded all regions of the world and the planet itself.

We ask those who are warring in the name of God to consider the extent to which they are damaging the work of the Creator.

We are part of the worldwide community of Jews, Palestinians and others who wish to help repair the world by building a new culture of peace. We are deeply grateful to all who are engaged in this work. We extend our hands to all who wish to lend their efforts to it, in a spirit of mourning, prayer and hope.

Upholding a bargain

Allow me to offer an alternative perspective to that of Anna Morgan and Rachael Turkienicz ("Diaspora Jews refuse traditional support for Jewish state," CJN, Aug. 29). I am one of the Diaspora Jews that the two authors intended to describe in their article. I refuse to support many actions of the Israeli government, and have often disengaged myself from the debate raging over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. However, a closer reading reveals that their description of me (and a growing number of my friends and relatives) is dead wrong.

Contrary to the insinuations in the article, my refusal to support Israeli government policies is completely separate from my support for the Israeli people. While I continue to contribute to organizations such as Magen David Adom that provide essential services to Israelis, my support of the government cannot and will not be unconditional. It is my hope that my political choices will help to steer Prime Minister Ariel Sharon away from policies that aim to provide security at the expense of Jewish morality. I believe there are solutions to this conflict that can integrate both of these elements, and would support any Israeli government that attempted to find them.

Furthermore, Morgan and Turkienicz do not properly understand why people like me have withdrawn from the debate. Reading letters to the editor, including Malcolm Barry's attack on Jewish protests against the occupation of the Palestinian territories, forces us into the political closet. I have been called a self-hating Jew, an ignorant fool and far worse by Jews who do not share my opinions. Many in the community have not allowed me to enter a debate; they accept no opposition whatsoever.

Morgan and Turkienicz depict me as an extremist who is not fulfilling her duty to her people, but I refuse to endorse a government that I see increasingly as vengeful and morally bankrupt. I believe that every life saved in this battle – Israeli and Palestinian alike – is an entire world saved, and I will continue to do what is within my means to promote a just peace. Although you may disagree with my politics, please know that in my eyes, I am upholding my end of my bargain with Moses.

Israel always challenged

With few exceptions, the majority of countries at the United Nation's General Assembly hate Israel with a raging passion.

Several countries have had the distinction of being placed in U.S. President George W. Bush's "axis of evil" for exporting weapons of mass destruction. While some moderate Palestinian leaders condemn suicide bombings, the Palestinian Authority (PA) encourages Hamas and Islamic Jihad to carry out bombings and continue attacks against Israeli civilians.

Recently, for the first time, Amnesty International finally condemned Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians as a crime against humanity and derided the double standards of Israel's critics.

But the PA pays no attention to the truth. Its members say their violent actions against Israeli civilians are justified in order to attain peace. They poison the minds of youth with hate and despair.

Under innumerable threats, the Jewish state continues to be challenged at the UN for its defensive actions and, as usual, the Jewish people look upon themselves as if they have gone out of Egypt again.

The lost Kol Nidrei, found

By CURT LEVIANT

About two years ago, I wrote a story about my search for a lost Kol Nidrei written by the Russian violin virtuoso, Mikhail Erdenko, at the request of Leo Tolstoy in 1910, the last year of the great writer's life. In case you missed it, here it is in a nutshell:

In a Jerusalem bookstore years ago, I met and befriended Reb Moshe Ashbel, an elderly, white-bearded Jew from Russia, an ex-math teacher and Lubavitch Chassid who had just made aliyah. In contrast to the average Chassid's antipathy to secular culture, Reb Moshe was widely learned. He loved music, cantorial and classical; had learned Hebrew as a child; and even under communism, continued to study Hebrew from his siddur, which he had inherited from his great-grandfather. He loved grammar and meticulous vocalization. Mistakes in printed texts irritated him, and he was fond of showing how the Chabad (Lubavitch) prayer book accurately vocalized words, which other siddurim were careless about.

When the State of Israel was founded in May 1948, Reb Moshe, who worked at a public school, expressed his joy in the presence of his fellow teachers. Soon thereafter, he was arrested and sent away for 10 years to one of Josef Stalin's labour camps. (The old joke in the gulag was that when someone complained that he was sent away for 15 years and didn't do a thing – the response was: You must have done something, because for doing nothing you only get 10 years.)

Freed after Nikita Khruschev's rise to power, Reb Moshe waited some 27 years until he was finally permitted to come to Israel in 1980. But at the Kiev airport, two items were taken from him. One was the score to Erdenko's Kol Nidrei and the other was his great-grandfather's siddur. For the sheet music, he wasn't going to make a fuss; he thought he could easily replace it. But for his siddur, which he had even carried into the gulag, he staged a sit-down strike. He announced he would not budge until the siddur was returned. Incredibly, the airport's chief of customs returned it.

Reb Moshe and I became friends during the six months I spent in Jerusalem that year, and before I left, he asked me to find a copy of the Erdenko Kol Nidrei and send it to him. He also wanted an LP of the Max Bruch Kol Nidrei for Cello and Orchestra, the score for his Hebraische Gesange, based on Lord Byron's Hebrew Melodies, and the score for Bruch's Kol Nidrei for Piano (Bruch, by the way, was not a Jew), as well as books on algebra and geometry. I sent him everything he wanted – except the Erdenko Kol Nidrei.

Despite many letters and phone calls to various music academies here and in Russia, I was not successful in finding that music. Even after Reb Moshe died in the early 1990s, I continued my search, for a promise doesn't vanish with a person's demise.

When my article on "The Lost Kol Nidrei" was published in the fall of 2000, events that had moved like tar suddenly sped up double time.

The first person to call was Eric Fettman, a journalist for the New York Post. He said he did a search for "Erdenko, violin," on the computer and found that a man named Sergei Erdenko had given a concert with his trio called Loiko in a synagogue in Phoenix, Ariz., in 1999. Seeing the name Erdenko, how could one not feel a measure of joy and surprise, a sense that a door hitherto sealed was now opening to reveal some light?

The synagogue Web site contained a slew of fascinating information. The Loiko Trio was based in Ireland of all places, and – sound the trumpets – Sergei Erdenko was the great-grandson of Mikhail Erdenko, who had been a professor at the Moscow Conservatory and a friend of Tolstoy. At that moment, I felt I was part of a great drama.

The Web site also listed a woman named Luba in Phoenix who was involved in ticket sales; the phone number was printed too. I called her and told her my story. She immediately gave me two addresses: the Loiko's Ireland address and Erdenko's private address in Paris.

Since the trio performed in a synagogue and was listed as playing Russian, Gypsy and Jewish music, I asked Luba about the concert's Jewish component. For I remembered that another Luba – Luba Dubinsky, the widow of the Russian violinist who had founded the Borodin Quartet – had told me that Erdenko was Jewish. If so, I mused, wouldn't he have known about the Kol Nidrei? When Tolstoy told him about the beautiful melody that the Jews have, wouldn't Erdenko, had he been a Jew, have responded, "Yes, I know it"? Moreover, why was he referred to as a "Gypsy violinist"? But a Russian Jewish musician now living in Philadelphia wrote me confirming that he may indeed have been a Jew since the chances were good that Erdenko was an assumed name.

That is why the Jewish component of the Loiko Trio's concert at the synagogue intrigued me. For if there was a Jewish substance to the trio's music, passed on from father to son over four generations, then the Jewishness of Erdenko would be confirmed. But Luba laughed. No, she said, they just played Hava Nagila and one other old Jewish chestnut from ages ago.

That night, I wrote two letters: one to the Loiko Trio in Ireland and one to Erdenko in Paris. Two years later, I am still waiting for an answer from Dublin. The letter to Sergei Erdenko was returned stamped inconnu, unknown, some seven weeks after I mailed it.

The light shining through the door, my hoped-for opening to resolve the mystery, was suddenly extinguished.

But then I got a call from a Russian named Oleg. He left me a message telling me that his former professor at Duke University had read the article and passed the information on to him. Oleg was at the University of Iowa, teaching Russian literature. He told me he had done something simple, again with a computer: In a search engine he had merely typed, "Erdenko, Kol Nidrei." He quickly learned that the library at the University of California had a copy of the score, which he would order for me.

I waited patiently. I can't say I dreamt about the score, but I did visualize it, reading the notes, in C major of course, to make it easy for myself. (In fantasies, you have a choice of key signatures.) But I knew it was in a minor mode, so there would be sharps and flats.

A couple of weeks later, Oleg called me.

"I have bad news and good news," he said.

I figured it's better to end with the good news, so I said, "Tell me the bad news first."

"The bad news is that the University of California cannot locate the score to the Erdenko Kol Nidrei. They have a listing for it but they can't find it."

"And the good news?"

"The good news is that I have a friend who works at the Moscow Conservatory and I'm going to call him and ask him to see if perhaps the score is there."

Again the wait began.

Meanwhile, someone else called to say that he had seen a composition by Erdenko on a CD but didn't recall its name. I called a record store and was told that a CD by Erdenko indeed existed – of a performance by Nikolai Erdenko. Now there was a new name. Who was he? In typical Russian fashion, the enigma was wrapped in a mystery.

Then, another man told me that the Loiko Trio had performed in Maryland (evidently, the information had been obtained from another Web site) and that by following it, I might be able – in the man's poetically formulated but factually incorrect words – "be able to fulfil Moshe Ashbel's dying wish."

But I was still waiting for Oleg's call, which came soon enough.

"Good news." His voice glowed all the way from Iowa City. "My friend phoned and told me that the Erdenko Kol Nidrei is in the Moscow Conservatory archives. After all, Erdenko had taught there. My friend will try to get it xeroxed and will mail it to me. By now, I'm as interested in seeing it as you are."

But two, three weeks passed. The mailbox remained empty. Nothing, day after day. I called Oleg again.

"It's on its way," he promised. "As we speak, it's flying over the Atlantic."

And right he was. It flew directly from Moscow to Iowa City via registered mail. And then a photocopy of the photocopy was on its way to me.

The other day, two packets came, one from Iowa, the other from Phoenix. I opened the one from Phoenix first. It contained a casette and a CD of music made by the Loiko Trio. The liner notes gave me a bit more information about Sergei Erdenko, including the fact that his colleague on the trio was his first cousin. The bio continued by saying that both cousins' families were musical and that –

The cover of Mikhail Erdenko's long lost score Kol Nidrei.

Bingo! Now the circle was closed and the mystery unravelled – another cousin of Sergei Erdenko, Nikolai Erdenko, was also a musician.

Then I opened the other packet and found the sheet music to Mikhail Erdenko's arrangement of the traditional Kol Nidrei, for piano and violin. The music has all the haunting qualities of the Yom Kippur melody that Ashkenazi Jews have been chanting for more than 500 years.

The score is faithful to the melody we all know, with all its grace notes and chazzanic ornamentation. The score had two covers, one with the Hebrew words Kol Nidrei and beneath it Kol Nidrei in Cyrillic letters. The other cover had the title in Latin letters. The music was published in 1912 jointly in Kiev and Warsaw. The Kol Nidrei is Erdenko's Opus 3, which means that it is one of his earliest compositions, and also that he wrote it and found a publisher in a relatively short time after his 1910 visit to Tolstoy.

Dear Reb Moshe! When I played the melody on the piano for the first time (not in C, but in F), I thought of you. I thought of sending you this melody that comes from the depths of the Jewish heart, a melody that binds you and me in love and friendship. Yes, it comes 10 years too late, but I know with what joy I would have mailed you the score that was wrenched from your hands by the Soviet authorities when you left for Israel, and with what joy you would have received it. But a happy conclusion to a search is always a simchah, no matter how long it takes, and it is thanks to so many people who were involved in helping me and helping you these past few months. Yes, I see your eyes smiling, dear, gentle, wise Reb Moshe, I hear your Russian-accented Hebrew even now, as you say in your signature double expression of gratitude, "Todah rabah, todah rabah."

What happened to us?

This article was written on Aug. 22, and my readers are invited to update it for themselves, if changes in the current situation should make it necessary.

Two recent trips I have taken south of the border were in some ways an eye opener. On the personal level, everything was great, for my hosts created a wonderful atmosphere for me.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Naturally, I read the local press and turned on the TV, and thus I was exposed to a great variety of reactions to the happenings in state and nation.

I thought I could detect a common thread, which I identified as a subconscious sense of insecurity. To someone who lives in Canada, it was unusual.

Here I was in a country that in many ways may be the greatest in the world, whose people have every reason to be grateful for the good fortune that is theirs. But something was missing. The 9/11 syndrome, that is the memory of last year's World Trade Center catastrophe, has had a fundamental impact.

The old sense of American security – political, social and economic – has diminished, and a large amount of newspaper space is now devoted to reports about Al Qaeda operations and the impact they have had on Western society in general and the United States in particular.

Not surprisingly, Jews are affected by this change in a special way, as they usually are under such circumstances.

Their basic insecurity, I was told, has become more evident, though the brevity of my sojourns made it impossible for me to form an opinion on the matter. In any case, I was wondering whether this change (if indeed it has occurred) will make a difference when it comes to support for, and identification with, Israel.

The end result may be two-sided: it may both increase and decrease support for Eretz Yisrael. This will, of course, depend on the situation. If the Jewish State is threatened in a very serious way, Diaspora Jewry, and American Jews especially, will rise up as one and come to the aid of Israel.

In a variety of ways, our history in Canada has been somewhat different from that of the American Jewish community. We are fewer in number, and perhaps because of that have always had a keener and more vibrant sense of peoplehood, though I did not sense this difference on my particular visits, which were spent in an atmosphere that made me feel at home in every way.

Once again I was confirmed in my conviction that, when the chips are down, Jews both north and south of the border will come through as they always have.

Days of reckoning for Israel

As the new year dawns, Israelis are debating much more than the status of contacts with the Palestinians or technical aspects of security arrangements on the ground.

The events of the last two years have challenged prevailing assumptions about identity and security more than at any other time since 1948. Almost in spite of themselves, Israelis are confronted with excruciating, existential questions about the ever-present dilemma of the balance among security, morality, democracy and the Jewish character of the state.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Some examples: Last month, in its first report on the country's "security index," Israel's National Security Council proposed a far-reaching definition of "security" that included demography and the country's Jewish majority as key components. The council's outgoing head, Gen. Uzi Dayan, recommended a unilateral decision on the country's borders, since the Jewish majority could be lost within 10 years if the current status quo does not change.

At the Israel Democracy Institute's annual Caesarea Economic Conference, several senior economists emphasized the connection between economic stability and security. They noted that weaker socio-economic groups are more vulnerable not just to the economic downturn caused by global developments and the intifadah, but also to the nature of terrorist attacks by suicide bombers. Less affluent Israelis are less able to alter their lifestyle to protect themselves and their families against terror in the streets. The implications for social and political stability are serious.

The arrest of seven Israeli Arabs suspected of collusion in the recent bloody terrorist attack at the Meron Junction has further exacerbated the already raging debate over the status of Israel's Arab citizens. Two years ago, when 13 Israeli Arabs demonstrators were killed by police, the Israeli Arab community lashed out at what it viewed as ultimate rejection and discrimination by the Jewish majority. Now, the growing acknowledgement by both sides of this divide of active support for the intifadah by a minority in the Israeli-Arab community is forcing them to confront the seriousness of the crisis. In an unprecedented statement, the National Security Council report also emphasized the need to better integrate Israel's Arabs in order to marginalize radical elements in that community.

Over the last several months, parents' voices have emerged in the debate over the moral dilemmas inherent in the army's continued presence in the West Bank and Gaza. Moving statements by two fathers throw this painful debate into sharp relief.

In an open public letter to his son, Avinoam Rekhess lamented the difficulty of applying humane principles to a conflict in which the "enemy chooses to establish itself in the holiest of churches in Bethlehem with nuns and priests as virtual hostages," and in which "it is possible that the smiling, young Palestinian woman approaching the checkpost is a ticking bomb."

In a moving cri de coeur, Rekhess said that for the first time in his life, he felt he "did not have the answers" and was "unable to protect" his soldier son. "Unlike war," he said sadly, "terrorism has no morals, ethics or limits. One second of futile faith in the deceptive loftiness of moral values may cost you your young life."

Yitzak Frankenthal, whose soldier son, Arik, was kidnapped and murdered several years ago, provided a different perspective in an anguished speech at a protest rally several weeks ago.

"If, in order to apprehend Arik's killers, innocent Palestinian children and other civilians had to be killed, I would ask the security forces to wait for another opportunity. If the security forces were to kill innocent Palestinians as well, I would tell them they were no better than my son's killers," he said.

"I would rather have the finger that pushes the trigger or the button than drops the bomb tremble before it kills my son's murderer than for innocent civilians to be killed."

While seemingly unrelated, this tapestry of voices reflects not just the openness of Israel but a sober realization of the complexity of the challenges and risks facing the country. After all, any resolution or containment of the conflict with the Palestinians is a means to a more important end – a stable, secure, democratic Jewish state. Slowly but discernably, some of these deeper questions are re-emerging from the daily preoccupation with security. These are important days of reckoning, not just for individuals but for the nation.

From bicycle helmets to circumcision

The opposition by some Alberta Sikhs to a provincial law requiring that children wear helmets while riding their bikes raises interesting question for Jews, and indeed all other religious minorities. These questions are all the more timely given the recent death of an infant in British Columbia, perhaps due to a botched circumcision. The death led to renewed media commentary and reports of opposition to routine non-religious circumcision of male infants.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

First, the helmet issue. As a recent Globe and Mail op-ed article by jurist Kathleen Mahoney suggested, safety concerns, especially relating to children, may well trump religious and other rights. Already Canadian courts have decided that mandatory seat belt laws are constitutional, despite their curtailment of individual freedom.

Some Sikh parents are claiming that requiring their sons to replace their turbans with a helmet while riding their bikes would represent an infringement of their religious freedom. But it is certainly possible the courts may decide that such an infringement, under Section 1 of the Charter, might be a reasonable limit that could be justified by the paramount concern of child safety.

Jews looking at the facts of this case might wonder about this strict interpretation by some Sikhs of their religious faith. After all, Judaism allows Jews to violate basic religious laws for reasons of health or risk to life. Why do Sikh religious scholars or leaders not make similar provisions? But to even raise the question undermines one of the tenets of religious freedom – the right of religious minorities to interpret their own religion. And yet, as we have seen for decades over many different court cases, there are complex cases when the state must intervene on precisely that subject.

In fact, the Sikh parents involved have argued turbans do indeed offer a high degree of protection. Indeed if scientific evidence could be adduced to support that view, the Sikh case could be strengthened. Wearing a turban might be construed as a form of reasonable accommodation. This would not be the case regarding a religion that prohibited any head covering.

But without such evidence, it is likely the view that child safety can trump religion would be strengthened. What has this to do with circumcision? Quite a bit.

Opponents of circumcision generally argue the practice is, on balance, medically harmful. But in fact the overall epidemiological evidence is unclear. There are short-term risks and longer term benefits. Both are calculated using probability statistics, and the positive and negative numbers seem to cancel each other out. The consensus seems to be that since there is no clear medical gain, and since the practice is invasive and done without the child's consent, it should not be performed for purely medical reasons.

But publicity given to rare episodes when a circumcision goes bad may tilt public opinion toward the view that the procedure is, on balance, counterproductive, even harmful. One of the claims being asserted is that circumcision is painful and traumatic for eight-day-old babies, and that this is by definition a "serious" harm that must be stopped. (The degree of pain is often lessened with ointments and freezing techniques.)

I cannot review the many sides of the debate here. But one often finds opponents of circumcision who seem to make allowances for procedures that are mandated for religious reasons. That is, opposition is directed only at circumcisions performed for so-called medical reasons.

This cultural sensitivity is praiseworthy. And it might seem to allow for exceptions to any eventual policy. But if it were ever established scientifically – or claimed falsely, yet successfully – that circumcision causes serious harm to an infant, safety would likely trump religious freedom every time. If something is harmful, it's harmful for everyone.

And if, even without new scientific evidence, politicians or policy-makers were to outlaw circumcision for non-religious reasons, it would stack the deck against all groups for whom the ritual is of key religious significance.

Implicit comparisons often cloud the debate. The harm caused by children failing to wear bicycle helmets is enormous, as are the horrific medical consequences of female genital operations. Well-meaning defenders of women's rights may (wrongly) see the failure to oppose male circumcision as a double standard.

One hopes that these and other distinctions are not lost on Canadian politicians and jurists as the circumcision debate unfolds.

The Kirshner File

A year after Sept. 11, Al Qaeda regroups

The first anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, unprecedented in their scope, ferocity and impact, has been observed in sombre ceremonies across the United States. But a year after Islamic fundamentalist Arab terrorists crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan, the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and rural Pennsylvania, killing about 3,000 American and foreign civilians in the greatest tragedy on U.S. soil since Pearl Harbour, the war on international terrorism, grandly proclaimed by U.S. President George W. Bush, has yet to be won.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

According to the Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. military campaign in Afghanistan, a stinging riposte to Sept. 11, has produced uneven results.

The war, launched last October, virtually wiped out Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network in Afghanistan, which planned and implemented Sept. 11, and destroyed Mullah Mohammed Omar's Taliban regime, which harboured and supported the terrorists.

But in chalking up these successes, the CIA and FBI contend, the United States dispersed the Al Qaeda network across a much wider geographic area. As a result, Al Qaeda is now working with extremists around the Islamic world. In other words, Al Qaeda has regrouped. This newly constituted, loosely knit alliance, seething with historic grievances, is as capable of launching assaults against the United States and its allies as Al Qaeda was prior to last September.

Since Sept. 11, Muslim fundamentalists loyal to, or part of, Al Qaeda have carried out a series of far-flung attacks, while Western, Asian and Arab security forces have foiled a number of terrorist plots.

In Pakistan, where Al Qaeda's centre of gravity appears to have shifted, Muslim militants have firebombed a Christian church and a Christian hospital, attacked a group of French naval engineers and the U.S. consulate in Karachi and murdered Daniel Pearl, a Jewish reporter on the staff of the Wall Street Journal. Thousands of kilometres away in Tunisia, an Al Qaeda operative detonated a truck bomb next to a venerable synagogue in Djerba. Twenty one people, including 12 German tourists, were killed by the blast.

Last December, 13 Al Qaeda agents were arrested in Singapore, accused of plotting to blow up the U.S. and Israeli embassies there. Shortly afterward, Richard Reid, a Briton who converted to Islam and who allegedly had ties to Al Qaeda, tried to bring down an American Airlines flight bound from Paris to Miami. In January, U.S. and Bosnian intelligence agencies captured an Al Qaeda suspect who had planned to attack American bases in and around Sarajevo.

A month later, Italian police arrested four Moroccans intent on destroying the American embassy in Rome. In May, Jose Padilla, an American who converted to Islam and who trained in Al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan, was charged with plotting to set off a "dirty" radioactive bomb in the United States. Then, in June, the Moroccan government broke up an Al Qaeda cell that had targeted NATO ships in the Strait of Gibraltar. Throughout this period, Jordan foiled several Al Qaeda plots to bomb hotels, tourist attractions and border crossings with Israel.

Washington, in a bid to combat global terrorism, has blocked the financial assets of individuals and organizations thought to be affiliated with Al Qaeda, but Al Qaeda still has access to millions of dollars worth of funds. The United States also placed Hamas and Islamic Jihad, among others, on its list of terrorist groups, and elicited a pledge from several nations, including Yemen, to disrupt and fight terrorism. Even Iran, which is usually hostile to the United States, seems to be co-operating. Last month, Tehran handed over to Saudi Arabia 16 Al Qaeda members who sought refuge in Iran after escaping from Afghanistan. But recent reports suggest that two senior Al Qaeda officials are still in Iran.

U.S. officials have expressed concerns over Saudi foot-dragging on sharing intelligence information. Syria, a charter member of the U.S. State Department's list of state sponsors of terrorism, has offered to co-operate with the United States. But Damascus' self-serving definition of terrorism clashes with that of the United States.

The Palestinian Authority, led by Yasser Arafat, quickly attached itself to the anti-terrorist camp and tried to curry favour with the United States after some Palestinians praised the Sept. 11 attacks. Bush, in response, endorsed Palestinian statehood. But in the face of Arafat's unwillingness or inability to stop terrorism, and following the news that Israel had intercepted a ship carrying Iranian arms to the Palestinians, Bush called for new Palestinian leadership, thereby aligning himself with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's position.

The announcement pleased Sharon, who had repeatedly accused Arafat of tolerating terrorism and who had not taken kindly to American critiques of Israeli armed incursions into Palestinian autonomous areas.

In Afghanistan, the hub of Al Qaeda's activities before Sept. 11, the fighting continues. The commander of U.S. forces there, Gen. Dan McNeill, said recently that one more year will be required to complete his mission: to crush the remnants of Al Qaeda and the Taliban and to build a viable Afghan national army that can keep the peace in a country that has known only turbulence and instability for much of its history.

Approximately 1,000 Al Qaeda and Taliban fighters still operate in Afghanistan and in Pakistan's lawless tribal areas. Much to the Americans' embarrassment, bin Laden and Omar, as well as bin Laden's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri, remain at large. They have eluded mopping up operations mounted by U.S., British, Canadian and Australian troops since last December.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, claims that bin Laden – who has issued a series of defiant anti-Western and anti-Israel videotapes – died in southeast Afghanistan in December. But according to other sources, bin Laden is alive and well.

Abu Zubaydah, Bin Laden's Palestinian chief of operations, was apprehended in March. His capture, a blow to Al Qaeda, came on the heels of back-to-back U.S. and allied raids against Al Qaeda bands in Afghanistan.

These ongoing raids, which coincide with joint American/Pakistani operations in Pakistan, have resulted in scattered skirmishes and discoveries of arms caches in areas ranging from the Shah-i-Kot Valley to the mountains of Tora Tora. By last week, 38 American soldiers had been killed and 340 wounded in Afghanistan.

Despite its efforts to stabilize the country, the United States is a long way from transforming Afghanistan into a normal civil society. On July 6, Afghanistan's vice-president, Hajii Abdul Qadir, was assassinated in Kabul – patrolled round the clock by a multinational force – and on Aug. 8, Afghan soldiers killed 12 Al Qaeda gunmen, believed to be Pakistanis, in a fierce firefight in the heart of the capital.

Qadir's death raised the fear that Afghan President Hamid Karzai may not be able to impose order on Afghanistan – which is riven by ethnic tensions and torn by bitter warlord rivalries – or eradicate Afghanistan's culture of war and perpetual conflict.

His aversion to "nation-building" notwithstanding, Bush has promised to rebuild Afghanistan. His secretary of defence, Ronald Rumsfeld, has expressed misgivings at the slow pace of reviving government institutions.

The Bush administration is also worried by challenges to Musharraf's authority. Radical Islamic critics have accused him of trading away Pakistan's sovereignty to the United States. But Musharraf retains control of the army, Pakistan's most powerful institution, and its influential intelligence services. For now, Musharraf, who seized power in a bloodless coup in 1999, is in little danger of being overthrown.

Washington, despite its best efforts, has not detected a direct link between Sept. 11 and its arch enemy, Iraq. There is simply no evidence that Iraq's president-for-life, Saddam Hussein, had anything to do with these events, though he certainly welcomed terrorists such as Sabri al-Banna (Abu Nidal), who died, or was murdered, in Baghdad last month. Bush, nonetheless, seems committed to a regime change in Iraq, mainly on the grounds that Saddam seeks weapons of mass destruction.

Brent Scowcroft – a former national security advisor under U.S. presidents Gerald Ford and George Bush – has warned that a war in Iraq would be counter-productive. Writing in the Wall Street Journal, he observed: "Any campaign against Iraq, whatever the strategy, cost and risks, is certain to divert us for some indefinite period from our war on terrorism." Arab and European countries have seized upon Scowcroft's argument to urge caution on Bush.

A year after the World Trade Center crumbled into ruins, the threat from international terrorism – and rogue regimes – is still very much of an issue.

And the memory and pain of Sept. 11 burn brightly.

A CRITICAL CAMPAIGN COUNTDOWN

Eight weeks and a few thousand donors to go. That's what lies ahead for UJA Federation's historic Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, which is currently calling all those who have yet to make a gift and asked us to contact them at this time. We've raised more than $54 million since April, when the campaign began four months ahead of schedule. Over $18 million in new and additional gifts have been designated to help Israelis rebuild their shattered lives. Every single Israeli family has been affected by more than 600 deaths, 4,200 injuries and a shaky economy, related to terror.

Israel's crisis is far from over, but together, we're helping Israel in exceptional ways. Our Jewish community belongs to an extraordinary North American fundraising drive, which has already raised $310 million U.S. on Israel's behalf.

"As a community, we should be proud of our strong contribution to a remarkable campaign," says Ronnie Appleby, the chair with Howard Sokolowski of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. "When Israel suffers, we all suffer. If everyone gives a gift, no matter how small, we can ease Israel's painful burden and demonstrate that we're truly stronger together," adds Sokolowski.

UJA Federation is sending all additional and new gifts directly to Israel to assist terror victims and their families, increase security for Israeli school children and provide a wide variety of human services for Israel's most vulnerable. Please read these pages for additional details on where these crucial campaign dollars are going.

RELIEVING TERROR

Since the wave of violence against Israel began two years ago, a common phrase has, unfortunately, crept into our vocabulary - Victims of Terror.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is allocating millions of dollars to help Israelis deal with the physical and psychological effects of terror and support those who treat terror victims. The funds, directed through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, will provide much-needed assistance for:

- Selah: Israel Crisis Management Center - to develop programs geared specifically for Victims of Terror
- A fund established by the Jewish Agency for children orphaned by terror
- Trauma units at hospitals across the country for new programs and emergency equipment

PROTECTING KIDS

For most Canadian students, staying safe at school means avoiding the schoolyard bully. But for Israeli students, it's about keeping terrorists at bay.

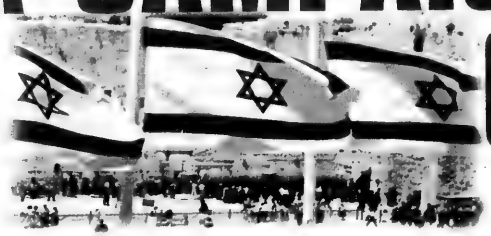
UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is helping to keep students safe by directing funds to a new JAFI program which will provide security protection for small schools and kindergartens in high-risk areas. The Israeli Police Force is providing guidance and training for this important protection initiative.

REMEMBERING THE VULNERABLE

With terror and a weak economy unfortunate facts of life in Israel today, and with government social assistance budgets redirected to security, Israel's vulnerable need more help than ever before. That's why UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is allocating funds for:

- Afternoon after-school programs to keep children safe
- Adolescent treatment centres
- Immigrant youth programs in among other locations, Kiryat Moshe, with which UJA Federation has developed a special relationship to assist newly arrived Ethiopians
- Parent and child centres and day care centres in underdeveloped communities

A CAMPAIGN OF HOPE



As Israelis reflect on two troubled years, they are remarkably focused on the future, despite the painful loss of lives, the physical and emotional wounds and the financial suffering they face.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is helping the people of Israel look ahead with hope.

These families, benefiting from UJA Federation donor generosity, represent thousands for whom we are there during days of distress.

A MOTHER'S COURAGE

On a typical February afternoon last year, Shoshana Gottlieb hopped on a van with a group of her co-workers from Jerusalem's Atarot industrial zone for her regular journey home. As usual, she expected to be the first one in the van since she was always the last one to get out.

But that day proved anything but typical. Curiously, Shoshana's colleagues didn't wait for her to get in first. And as the van made its way toward suburban Givat Ze'ev, it was ambushed by terrorists.

Three of her colleagues died in a hail of bullets. Shoshana, a mother of four, was left a paraplegic.

The bullet that entered Shoshana's spine that afternoon severed her spinal cord, went through her lungs, just missed the aorta, and stopped at her shoulder blade, leaving fragments throughout her body. She remained in intensive care for four days after the attack, undergoing an operation to remove the bullet and repair her lung. Shoshana stayed in hospital for many months during rehabilitation.

Yet despite her suffering, Shoshana's spirit is unwavering. Her harrowing experience, she says, has made her much more relaxed and more patient with her family and with life in general. She continues to work part-time as the import/export manager of a local chemical company. The mother of a 15-year-old son with Down's Syndrome, Shoshana counsels other parents on how to integrate their Down's Syndrome children into everyday life. She even passed a driving test for a special vehicle.

The Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner, assisted Shoshana and her family to purchase a portable electrical device that allows wheelchairs to climb stairs. The device enables Shoshana to leave her apartment in case of emergency without having to be carried down four flights, and will allow her to visit her married daughter who lives in a building without an elevator.

A WIDOW'S PRIDE

Israeli border policeman Yoel Binenfeld and his partner were conducting a routine prisoner transfer when a car stopped them at an intersection. The driver had heard shots being fired on the road to Emmanuel and suggested the officers investigate.

Yoel immediately turned the jeep around. They were the first army personnel on the scene of a bus attack, in which three terrorists had assaulted the bus and several passenger cars with roadside bombs, anti-tank grenades and light arms fire. Ten people were killed and 30 injured.

When they saw the jeep, all of the terrorists but one fled. The lone gunman took aim at the officers. Yoel was killed instantly. His partner was critically injured and remains paralyzed today.

For Yoel's wife, Dorit, her husband's death is bittersweet. On the one hand, the IDF has told her that Yoel's intervention undoubtedly saved the lives of many others. On the other hand, she's now a widow and her seven-year-old son Dean – who is autistic – has lost his beloved father.

Dean needs highly intensive Applied Behavior Analysis (ABA) therapy, which requires some 30 to 40 hours per week of potential learning opportunities - the majority conducted on a one-on- one basis with a trained therapist.

To ease the financial burden, the Jewish Agency, through funds from UJA Federation campaigns, is providing Dorit with financial assistance so Dean can benefit from his therapy.

His father would be proud.

- Assistance to victims of terror and their families
- Increased security for children in day cares, kindergartens and other facilities for children
- Increased medical and psychological support plus other human services for those most affected by Israel's situation - the poor, the elderly and new immigrants

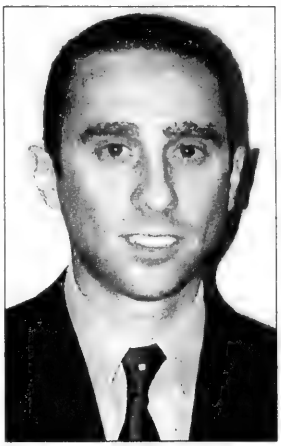
Jewish lifestyle becomes harder to maintain in Argentina

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



Guillermo Burman

Among the changes Argentines have had to cope with in recent years is a new type of crime, said Guillermo Burman during a recent lunch at a downtown Toronto law firm.

The 31-year-old lawyer, who works for a private company in Buenos Aires, told members of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's young lawyers division that one of the consequences of social, political and economic upheaval in Argentina is decreased personal safety, an example of which is known as "express kidnapping."

The new breed of kidnapper demands a relatively small sum of money for the return of the kidnapped person within a few hours, Burman explained.

Political and economic instability have taken a toll on Argentines in general and on the country's Jewish community in particular. Burman's talk addressed the economic and social crisis in Argentina and offered an overview of life there today.

The Jewish community, the majority of whom live in Buenos Aires, has shrunk to 197,00 from 310,000 Jews in 1970.

At that time, there were more than 60 Jewish schools, 70 synagogues, three teacher training institutes and 10 clubs and social institutions. Now there are only 30 schools serving 15,000 students – 6,000 less than in 1990, said Burman.

The 1990s were a sad time for Argentina's Jewish community, he said, noting the 1992 bombing of Israel's embassy, when 27 people were killed and 220 injured, and the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community building, in which 87 people were killed and 200 injured.

Today, middle class Jews have been most affected, said Burman.

"It's really difficult to support a Jewish lifestyle... It's not cheap to send children to a Jewish school, a Jewish club. If you don't have enough money for rent, mortgage or food, you will not be able to afford that Jewish style of life."

Because of that, he said, Argentina's Jews are facing assimilation.

Burman said there has been no "extraordinary" anti-Semitic reaction to the situation in Argentina. "It's a Catholic country, and Jews are a minority. The minorities have problems, but so far not extraordinary."

The response of the Jewish community, said Burman, is focused on tzedakah, including the running of a soup kitchen for the Jewish community; aliyah, with a total of 5,500 people expected to move to Israel in 2002; and trying to strengthen the Jewish education system through mergers and scholarships.

Ironically, said Burman, Argentina has the natural resources – minerals and vast, fertile lands – to be a wealthy country.

But the country began to lack political stability in 1930, the beginning of a decades-long series of coups d'état and economic crises that lasted until 1983.

Even after democracy returned to Argentina, the economy remained unstable. In 1989, said Burman, Argentina suffered hyperinflation with the consumer price index running above 1,300 per cent annually.

There was steady economic growth in the 1990s, in part due to foreign investments, Burman noted. Other changes included widespread privatization of public utilities.

But corruption, fiscal deficit and a crisis in international markets were among the factors that precipitated a social, political and economic crisis in the late 1990s. Elections are scheduled for next March, but no one knows what the outcome will be, said Burman. The country's public debt amounts to $140 billion (US).

Currently, 34.2 per cent of the population is unemployed or underemployed. Almost 5 million people do not have jobs and 53 per cent of the population lives below the poverty line, he said.

Lawyers, he noted, do have work – a lot of it – because there have been many changes in law.

Sisters collect change for Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Siblings Naomi, Orli and Yael Matlow are trying to put a positive spin on the recent terrorist attacks in Israel.

Since visiting Israel last spring when several bombings occurred, the three United Synagogue Day School, Bathurst branch students have raised almost $5,000 for Magen David Adom toward the purchase of an ambulance.

Naomi, 12, said that she, Orli, 8, and Yael, 6, were in Israel with their family for the bat mitzvah of their twin cousins.

Money to go towards purchase of ambulance

"You could see soldiers, police and security guards all over," she said. "They were out there protecting us and everybody else. Unfortunately, some terrorists still got through.

"After each terror attack, we would watch television and see all of the doctors and ambulances racing to the scene. That's when we decided we should try to help, too," said Naomi.

When they arrived home, she said, they decided to ask people for the loose change that they toss into bowls, jars or draws.

"We asked them to go to where they keep their pennies, nickels, dimes and quarters and empty it out. We would also take loonies, toonies and bills if they had them," said Orli.

"People really liked the idea, and were happy to help. Some lawyers at Goodmans, where my dad [David] works, had been collecting their coins for five years. They gave them all to us. They weighed a ton," Orli said.

She said that friends were moving to a new house and found coins all over as they packed. "They must have given us 100 pounds of coins, including some from Kenya. One friend, Brenna Singer, contributed her bat mitzvah money."

The coins collected so far, she said, include more than 41,000 pennies, 5,400 nickels, 8,500 dimes and 3,600 quarters.

"Our grandparents, Jack and Rochelle Singer, and our nanny, Pilar, helped us roll change for several days to prepare the money for deposit into Magen David Adom's bank account," she said.

The girls hope that other children pick up on their idea. "We would love to see a picture of an ambulance which says that it has been donated by the children of Toronto or the kids of Canada," they said.

Naomi said that she and her sisters have learned a lot from their project. "We learned that people are really concerned about what is happening in Israel and are happy to help. All you need to do is ask.

"We also learned that small bags of coins can quickly add up to real money, and that most of all, change can help change a life," she said.

legacy of life

Ralph Snow 1921 - 2000

Ralph Snow grew up in a brutal world full of pain and suffering. When he was finally set free, the quiet and unassuming man committed himself to making the world a much safer and happier place for his family, his friends, and his community.

"Having lived through the Holocaust, there's a certain commitment to the survival of the Jewish people," says Michael Rosenberg, a survivor who shared a 40-year friendship with Mr. Snow. "Ralph was a man of extreme sensitivity and depth, and I respected a great deal his wisdom, his approach to issues, and his total commitment to his people."

Ralph Snow was born Raphael Schneebaum in Przemysl, Poland, the only child of loving and cultured parents. He longed to be a lawyer like his father, but it wasn't to be. His father was shot by the Nazis, his mother went into hiding, and young Raphael took a factory job so he could continue to pay a local Pole to keep his mother safe. It was only when he was shipped off to a concentration camp that Raphael learned an agonizing truth: his mother had been killed rather than hidden, with the Pole still taking his hard-earned cash.

With the war over, the ever-capable Mr. Snow continued to help others. He and his new wife Bella – also a Holocaust survivor – were living in a British-zone Displaced Persons (DP) camp when Ralph heard there were bread, sardines and soap available in the American zone. With the borders closed, 50 couples pooled their resources – a loaf of bread, a package of cigarettes – and "paid" a guide to take Ralph over the Austrian mountains to find a path to the American zone. When Ralph returned, he guided everyone back.

Ralph and Bella Snow

Although they had dreams of moving to Israel, circumstance found the Snows in Canada, where determination paid off once again. Ralph quickly moved from milkman to partner in the dairy. Soon he was owner of the Nag's Head restaurant chain and would joke that he had gone "from milk to beer." He worked hard to support his family, but once his two children were grown he retired from the business world and turned instead to full-time community work.

Devoting himself to his people was, perhaps, Ralph's way of healing his war wounds, his chance to personally better a world that was so cruel to those he loved. He started as a member of B'nai Brith's Yorkdale Lodge, comprised mainly of Holocaust survivors, and moved through the ranks to become president of B'nai Brith Canada. Ralph was instrumental in creating the Societies Division of UJA Federation and worked tirelessly as a UJA campaigner. He was president of Beit Halochem Canada, vice-president of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, and president of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in Toronto. He was active with the Jewish National Fund, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), the Reena Foundation, and a host of other organizations.

"Ralph was a very able and willing person and somehow everybody learned of his abilities," says Bella. "Everybody loved him. He just couldn't say no to anyone, and he was never too lazy or too tired to help. If we would have gone to Israel instead of coming to Canada, Ralph might have been Prime Minister."

The Snows commitment also inspired their children. Daughter Margot Feferman is a Toronto social worker and son Alan is a prominent scientist living in Seattle. Grandchildren Jay, Sari and Noah all attend university.

When Ralph died of cancer in March 2000, an entire community grieved. Even illness didn't slow him down, says Bella. It was simply his nature to help.

Going that extra mile

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we evaluate the past year, with Yom Kippur approaching, most of us feel it was a particularly difficult one. Disasters occurred on a global scale and Jews faced trying challenges both at home and abroad. Many people responded in whatever way they could but still felt frustrated and disillusioned. Yom Kippur always demands honest self-assessment, but perhaps this year we should broaden our perspectives.

It is customary for everyone to ask forgiveness from their fellow human beings in preparation for Yom Kippur. The rabbis of the Talmud clearly state several times that although Yom Kippur can serve to correct our relationship with God, it does nothing to reconcile human relationships. In order to atone for human misdeeds, we must apologize to those we have wronged. Often pride can stand in our way.

Usually, one manages to ask forgiveness from those close to us who we know share our understanding of the day. We make a general sweeping apology that includes "anything I might have done to offend you." With time and attention, I'm sure one could actually identify an instance of offence, whether intended or accidental. Yet we do not want to humble ourselves by admitting the particulars of our misdeed, so we make sweeping generalizations.

We teach our children to ask forgiveness from their parents, their friends and their teachers. We hope they can overcome their awkwardness in speaking to both peers and authority figures, but do we likewise show them the same courtesy?

Maybe this is the year when teachers should take a moment and approach their students privately and individually to ask for forgiveness for those occasions when the casual remark inflicted shame. Maybe this is the year that parents should take each child separately and identify moments of unintended hurt and apologize. Maybe this is the year that employers should apologize to their employees.

If it is pride standing in our way, then Yom Kippur becomes an empty shell. Humility is one of the most central values in Judaism, and the one day of the year when we should truly understand that we are all equal is certainly Yom Kippur.

When we have overcome our pride and gone that extra distance, we can turn to God more honestly and share our sorrows, anger and disillusionment about the past year.

The midrash states that God's vessel is the human heart. It continues to explain that when a heart is full of pride, divine communication is blocked. Yet when God senses a broken heart, God says: "This one is mine."

Canadian academics and Israel

Guest Voice

By MICHAEL BROWN

It was quite disappointing to read the Aug. 22 CJN article by David Goldberg and Tilly Shames, "Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challenge Mideast distortion." While the article attempts to be balanced, in effect, it stigmatizes Canadian academics as inactive in defence of Israel. The judgement is misleading and unhelpful. Personally, I should like to conserve my energies for challenging my opponents, not for protecting my flanks from friends.

Let me offer a counter-reading of the present situation and an elaboration of the positive suggestions of Goldberg and Shames.

The past year has been a difficult one at campuses around the world, including in Canada. Israel has been one issue; anti-Semitism, not always obviously related to Israel, has been another. And then there are local issues of Jewish concern at many universities, issues not directly related to either of the above, but which need attention if Jewish life on campus is to continue to flourish.

Certainly at York, but elsewhere, too, many academics, Jewish and gentile, have been working overtime to meet the challenges appropriately. Very often, public activities are not the most likely to succeed, however well they might be regarded by those outside the university.

Canadian campuses have been rather more peaceful than those elsewhere, partly because of the successful behind-the-scenes work of faculty, students and administrators, Jewish Campus Services and community organizations. The academic boycott of Israeli academics, for example, has been vigorously (and, I think, successfully, at least so far) opposed by academics around the country, although not necessarily in ways apparent to the general public.

That said, I do agree that more will need to be done in the coming months. Goldberg and Shames suggest the creation of chairs of Israel Studies. That is a good idea, but it is a long-term and expensive solution to immediate problems.

Interestingly, just a few years ago, there existed on Canadian campuses three effective instruments for the defence of Israel's cause: the Canada-Israel Academic Exchange; the Academic Study Circles, founded by Professor Emil Fackenheim and the late Hebrew University Prof. Moshe Davis; and the Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East (CPPME), in which the late Prof. Harry Crowe of York University played a significant role.

The exchange brought Israeli academics to Canada for year-long teaching stints. While here, the professors devoted much time to media appearances that enabled them to present Israel's case knowledgeably to a wide public. In their courses, they ensured a fair treatment of both sides to the Arab-Israeli conflict, as course evaluations at York by partisans of both sides showed year after year.

The study circles, which I chaired for a time, gathered together academics from different disciplines to study Israel-related themes and issues. They helped to create an informed cadre of Canadian academics prepared to engage in dialogue on the history, politics, and economics of Israel and on Zionist thought.

The CPPME provided a friendly, although essentially neutral, forum for the discussion of Middle East affairs. It published a journal and sponsored low-cost study trips to Israel and other countries in the region.

All three programs worked. All three were low-cost and required minimal financial subvention by the Jewish community. In the case of the academic exchange, the host universities paid a large portion of the expenses, since the visitors offered courses as part of the regular curriculum.

That modest support, however, was withdrawn a few years ago. The three initiatives were deemed by the community leadership to no longer be necessary. As a result, three established, effective programs disappeared just at the moment when they were most needed, when they could have provided a credible, knowledgeable presentation of Israel's case.

Whether the exchange, the study circles or the CPPME can be revived, I do not know. Putting them back together or creating some new groups to do their work will certainly be much more difficult – and likely more expensive – than maintaining the existing structures would have been.

In any case, what we as a community need to learn is the importance to us of campus life and activities. Most Jews of university age are to be found on campus, where they will form life-long attitudes. (So, too, will young gentiles.)

We are blessed in Canada with many Jewish faculty members and students who are active, involved and outspoken, and are willing to devote time and energy to Jewish affairs. We are also blessed with many non-Jewish faculty members and administrators eager to ensure that issues of concern to the Jewish community will be treated fairly on-campus and off.

To do their job in times of crisis, however, students and faculty of good will need support on an ongoing basis, not criticism in times of crisis. If their voices are to be heard above the din, and if their activities are to have an impact on campus and off, the community must assist their efforts. Programs such as the Canada-Israel Academic Exchange can accomplish a great deal with modest support, but they cannot survive without any funding at all.

And in the long term, the outcomes desired by Goldberg and Shames and so many others of us in the community can only be achieved by the commitment of substantial resources to campus activities.

Prof. Michael Brown teaches at York University and is the former director of its Centre for Jewish Studies.

UN still no friend of Israel

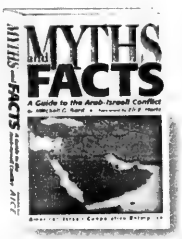
MYTH:

The 1991 repeal of the resolution equating Zionism with racism proves that the United Nations is no longer biased against Israel.

FACT:

The vote did not signal an end to the UN's bias against Israel. The same month, the UN General Assembly approved four new one-sided resolutions on the Middle East.

On Dec. 9, 1991, Israel's handling of the first Palestinian intifadah was condemned by a vote of 150-2. On the Dec. 11, it voted 104-2 for a resolution calling for a UN-sponsored peace conference that would include the PLO and voted 142-2 to condemn Israeli behaviour toward Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza.



On Dec. 16 — the very day it repealed the Zionism measure — the UN voted 152-1, with the United States abstaining, to call on Israel to rescind a Knesset resolution declaring Jerusalem its capital, to demand Israel's withdrawal from "occupied territories," including Jerusalem, and to denounce Israeli administration of the Golan Heights. Another resolution expressed support for Palestinian self-determination and the right of return for Palestinian refugees.

The repeal vote was marred by the fact that 13 of the 19 Arab countries, including those engaged in negotiations with Israel — Syria, Lebanon and Jordan — voted to retain the resolution, as did Saudi Arabia. Six, including Egypt — which lobbied against repeal — were absent.

The Arabs "voted once again to impugn the very birthright of the Jewish State," the New York Times noted (Dec. 17, 1991). "That even now most Arab states cling to a demeaning and vicious doctrine mars an otherwise belated triumph for sense and conscience."

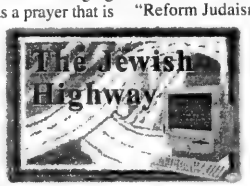
Kol Nidrei and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's one of the pivotal moments of the Jewish calendar. Worshippers flock to their synagogues, many dressed in white, and wait for the cantor to start singing Kol Nidrei. But why has a prayer that is concerned with annulling vows and oaths become so famous? Some insights from the Web.



The prayer so associated with Yom Kippur has actually been the source of controversy for centuries. Eliezer Segal explains that although the annulment of vows dates back to the Mishnah, its association "with Yom Kippur probably reflects a popular feeling that unfulfilled obligations would impede the atonement process." However, many rabbinic authorities opposed Kol Nidrei. The prayer didn't conform to normal requirements of annulment of vows, which include individual interrogation and the expression of regret. But in the end "the rabbis were compelled to make a difficult choice between insistence on respect for one's word, and compassion for those real people who urgently needed such a procedure for easing their consciences and permitting their forgiveness." [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/910906_Kol_Nidre.html]

I was surprised to find that Kol Nidrei has also generated controversy beyond the Jewish community. There are many non-Jewish Web sites that are alarmed by the existence of this prayer and what they feel is a license to lie and deceive year after year. The "Explaining Kol Nidrei" Web site goes through the prayer line by line and clarifies that it applies only to vows made by an individual to God and not between individuals. [http://www.angelfire.com/mt/talmud/kolnidre.html]

Stephen Butterfass of Temple Israel of Northern Westchester writes that "Reform Judaism initially banned Kol Nidrei from the High Holy Day prayer books as an embarrassment and as a symbol of all that Jews represented to the modern gentile world."

It was not officially reinstated into the liturgy until the 1978 edition of the Gates of Repentance, in use today. Bufferfass adds: "If some of the ancient rabbis were correct, that ethical and legal objections are outweighed by the need to forgive ourselves for unfulfilled promises in order to attain the necessary state of atonement during Yom Kippur, then Kol Nidrei will be with us for a long time." [http://www.uahc.org/ny/tinw/ReligiousLiving/kolnidrei.htm]

It is not known when Kol Nidrei was first sung. The Kol Nidrei melody was first notated in 18th century Berlin. The Protestant German composer Max Bruch (1838-1920) arranged Kol Nidrei into the cello concerto that is familiar today. [http://www.xs4all.nl/~danlo/irwin/music/bruch.html] You can listen to a beautiful version at Temple Sholom of West Essex, N.J. [http://sholom.net/rosh_hashana_music-5761.htm] Hebrew University's Jewish National and University Library has Ashkenazi and Sephardi melodies in addition to a rendition recorded in Tangiers in the early 1960s. [http://www.jewish.com/download/music/high_holiday_music/] You can listen to more renditions at the Jewish.com Web site. [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/music/holidays/holidays_eng.htm]

A few years ago, American pianist Ben Zebelman turned Kol Nidrei into a four-movement arrangement that lasts nearly 40 minutes, possibly the longest version of Kol Nidrei to date. You can listen to an interview with Zebelman on National Public Radio's Web site [http://www.npr.org/programs/atc/books_music/1999/sep/] and excerpts of the Kol Nidrei Variations on Zebelman's Web site. [http://www.benzebelman.com/KolNidreVariations.html]

Whatever the melody, Kol Nidrei has the ability to touch our soul. Judy (Weissenberg) Cohen will never forget the Kol Nidre that "happened in a place where, we felt, it was appropriate that instead of we asking forgiveness from God, God should be asking for forgiveness from us." In 1944, Judy Weissenberg was 15 years old and a prisoner with 800 other women at Auschwitz-Birkenau. On Yom Kippur, some of the older women asked their kapos for permission to do something for Kol Nidrei. They received a candle, a siddur and 10 minutes to pray. [http://www.interlog.com/~mighty/fragments/fragment2.htm] But instead of praying, the women burst into tears.

"It was almost as if our hearts burst. I never heard either before or since then such a heart rendering sound. Even though no one really believed the prayer would change our situation, that God would suddenly intervene – we weren't that naive – but the opportunity to cry and remember together helped us feel better. It reminded us of our former, normal lives; alleviated our utter misery, even for a littlest while, in some inexplicable way… That is the Kol Nidrei I always remember."

Couple study the then and now of Israeli society

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In intellectual circles back home in Jerusalem, Amiram and Rivka Gonen are no doubt an academic power couple.

Amiram serves as director of the Floersheimer Institute for Policy Studies (www.fips.org.il) and he has recently researched and written a book about the relationship between secular Israeli society and the haredim.

Rivka served as curator of the department of Jewish ethnography at the Israel Museum for 15 years until she retired two months ago. She has studied the lifestyles and origins of Jewish communities around the world, including those in remote corners of the globe. A trained archeologist, she's also an expert on ancient Israelite history as well as excavations in Jerusalem.

The two professors were in Toronto recently for the wedding of their son, Uri, to Julia Castor. Prior to returning to their home in Jerusalem, they sat down with The CJN and described some of their latest work.

Rivka is a prolific author who's latest work is The Quest for the 10 Lost Tribes of Israel; To the Ends of the Earth.

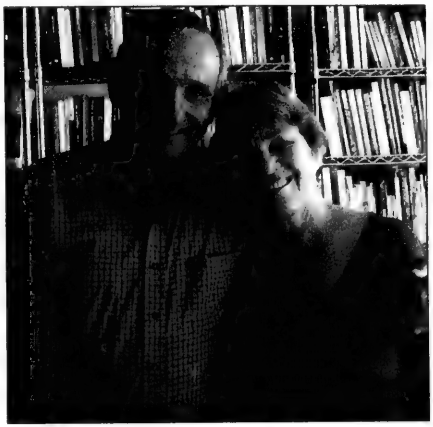
A fan of suspense stories, Rivka said the fate of the 10 Israelite tribes is one of history's greatest mysteries. It has captured the imagination of people around the world, with the result that groups with no concrete connection to ancient Israel now claim they are descendants of the lost tribes.

Claims of descent have been advanced by such varied groups as British Christians, the Maori tribesmen of New Zealand and the Zuni people of southwest United States.

Usually, if you dig deep enough, you can find these claims were influenced by Christian missionaries who were fascinated with the story of the lost tribes and attributed ancient Judaic practices to people they encountered. These claims were internalized by the visited groups and many came to believe that they too were among God's chosen people – a very enticing proposition, Rivka said.

"Most of the world reads the Bible and the prophets' promise that those Israelites and Judeans who were deported will come back and be united under God and be successful and multiply," she said.

For Christian missionaries, finding the lost tribes was an especially attractive proposition, since it would lead to the fulfillment of biblical prophecy, she added.



Amiram and Rivka Gonen

During the 19th century, she continued, a "British Israelite" movement sprang up. It was in part an attempt by devout people to discern a reason for the British people's tremendous worldly success. "In the Victorian age, the British decided… that the promise of Israel had been transferred to them," Rivka said.

Furthermore, the name "British" was taken to reflect the two Hebrew words, "brit" and "ish," or the covenant of the people, she said.

Meanwhile, in Denmark some came to believe the Danes were descendants of the biblical tribe of Dan while in remote Myanmar (Burma). the Shinlung people now claim to be descendants of the tribe of Menashe. The Shinlung, Rivka said, are the lowest group on the local social ladder and "like the idea of being chosen by God."

In Japan, a small group believe the natural calamities that often befall their homeland are parallels of the divine retribution often seen in the Bible. Furthermore, the ancient migration to the Japanese heartland around Kyoto mirrors the exile of the ancient Israelites, she said.

If you look beneath the surface, however, you can often find the influence of 19th century Scottish missionaries, who passed along their beliefs to the local Japanese, Rivka said.

The Maoris of New Zealand were also influenced by Christian missionaries, but they could not identify with the New Testament story of Jesus. A warrior people, they found Jesus too "feeble" while the "fighting God" of the Hebrew Bible "appealed to their own character. They saw themselves [like the] persecuted Israelites fighting oppressors… and they came to believe they were Israelite tribes."

Other suggestions that the Pashtuns of Afghanistan and even groups in Zimbabwe are the lost tribes are simply "bubbe maises" (old wives' tales) with no basis in fact, she asserted.

Rivka has written a new book that addresses another fascinating issue – the archeology of the Temple Mount. Titled Contested Holiness: Jewish, Christian and Muslim Perspectives on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, it is slated for release in 2003.

Reinforcing her view that ancient mysteries can grab hold of the contemporary imagination, she notes how British Israelites believe the Ark of the Covenant now resides in Ireland at a site that was once holy to the island's early Celtic residents.

Amiram's work is grounded in the here and now. His latest book, published by the institute, is From Yeshiva to Work: The American Experience and Lessons for Israel.

The institute, in pursuing its mandate to present policymakers with strategies and approaches to key social issues, has studied the role of the Orthodox in Israeli society, Amiram said.

Networking club brings young people together

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Jori Gertner was thinking about her next career move after leaving her job at an interactive marketing firm in May.

While considering potential employment options, the 23-year-old communications graduate contemplated going back to school.

"I felt confused. I felt like everyone else has it figured out and I don't," said Gertner.

It was then that she realized she probably wasn't alone.

"I thought that if I feel this way then other people must feel this way," she said. "Then I thought maybe not everyone has it all figured out and maybe it would be neat for us to get together and have an opportunity to network and meet."

This led Gertner to the idea of forming a club for young people to meet in a professional context to share personal stories and learn from one another.

To gauge interest in her idea, Gertner e-mailed her friends and encouraged them to pass her message on to others. It wasn't long before she was getting responses from strangers who were enthusiastic about joining a networking club for young people.

"I got e-mails from people I didn't know who said they felt the same way as I did," said Gertner.

With this strong show of interest, Gertner set about organizing the club's first event, which took place Aug. 27 at Temple Sinai.

The theme was "the pressure to succeed" and featured guest speaker Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, an organizational psychologist and executive coach. The event was sponsored by Temple Sinai's Next Generation program, which organizes social and educational programs for Jews aged 25 to 39.

The event attracted about 30 people in their 20s and early 30s who shmoozed over a pizza dinner before the presentation. Later, they lingered to discuss the issues raised by Salsberg Ezrin and to make new connections.

Afterward, many agreed on the value of Gertner's idea.

"I think Jori stumbled upon a gold mine," said Ida Gold, who viewed the first event as an opportunity to learn about others. "I got insight from other attendees. I want to be better informed about what other people are doing because maybe that will help me in my future choices."

The club also lets members network with people from a wide range of backgrounds and professions.

"I don't think there's enough things where people get together from different industries and different backgrounds," said attendee Amanda Kelman.

Tracey Starr, another participant, echoed this sentiment.

"Sometimes people get so involved in their work that they forget what's going on in other professional circles," she said. "It's an effective tool for bringing people together to share ideas and bounce things off each other."

Gertner hopes to hold the club's next meeting in October. Plans for future events include bringing in a public relations professional to discuss the advantages of networking and a speaker-led discussion on the importance of having a mentor.

Gertner said one of her goals is to hear success stories that originated in the club.

"If one person tells me they met someone at the networking club that they wouldn't have met otherwise, then I'm happy," she said.

For more information, contact Gertner at gertnerj@hotmail.com.

Amiram examines lives of haredi Jews in book

In a book on the topic edited by Shlomo Hasson, Amiram wrote "a scenario" in which the secular population departs Jerusalem and leaves control of the city to the haredim.

In his own book, Amiram examines the way the haredi Jews have adjusted to modernity in the United States and compared it to the Israeli experience.

Amiram attributes the communities' different coping mechanisms to several factors:

In the United States, consumerism is very powerful and the opportunity for individuals to improve their status is greater than in Israel. "The Orthodox in the United States make big money in computers, stocks, property. Lots of Orthodox serve as role models. They're very successful – empire builders."

That level of success is hard for Israeli haredim to accept, so to avoid disappointment they instead say, "God will provide."

In the United States, Gonen continued, many aspects of secular lifestyles are considered by the haredim to be non-Jewish and can, therefore, be dismissed as being foreign.

In Israel, on the other hand, the secular way of life is enjoyed by fellow Jews and is seen as a competing lifestyle that poses a unique danger. As a result, Israeli ultra-Orthodoxy is "harsher perhaps, more aggressive in its membership and more combative with the rest of society."

In Israel, he continued, haredim avoid army service by claiming a student exemption. Once they embark on a life of study, they may soon find themselves with several children and without a trade. In earlier generations, the haredim were forced by necessity to find a line of work to support themselves, Amiram noted.

American haredim have established schools to ready their students for work in a trade or for a university education.

Amiram believes the continuing migration of religious American Jews to Israel will benefit the local haredim by providing role models – examples of people who have accepted modernity without abandoning their traditions.

"Modernity need not mean secularism," he said. "Within the modern world, they can live quite integrative instrumentally without succumbing to secular views."

Israel's advocates should focus on the right targets

By ED MORGAN

Guest Voice

Ed Morgan

In a recent CJN article ("Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challenge Mideast distortion," Aug. 22), the anti-Israel rhetoric prevalent on Canadian campuses today was said to be the fault of, wouldn't you know it, the pro-Israel academics on campus. This approach to Israel advocacy reflects a discernible trend.

Popular columnist Charles Krauthammer wrote an article several months ago about the end of the peace process that has been circulated on the Internet by Jewish advocates as "perhaps the finest speech on the Middle East in the last ten years." Krauthammer's piece, which was adapted from a speech given at Bar Ilan University, declares that Israel has at long last recovered the inner strength to vanquish its primary enemy. That enemy, Krauthammer argues, is neither Hamas, nor Islamic Jihad, nor Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, nor Iraqi President Saddam Hussein; it is none other than Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and the ideology that he represents.

Community leadership of past generations seems to relish in reciting, Monty Python-style, how they rose to much tougher challenges in their day. Community members who have rarely, if ever, attended a rally or demonstration consistently ask why the Jewish community can't produce evidence of mass public support for its causes. People who never read the Jewish press to find out what community organizations are doing rail at the fact no one knows what community organizations are doing. E-mail discussions circulate about how no one engages in any activism for Israel anymore except to circulate e-mails.

Several months ago the director general of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs testified before the Knesset on the failings of the country's hasbarah efforts. When grilled on why Israel's image has become so tarnished in world public opinion, he responded that it's not the salesmen who are at fault, it's the product. Give us better policies, he told Israeli lawmakers, and we'll give the world better explanations.

In Israel's time of crisis, the most popular sport in the Jewish world is finger-pointing.

But it's not only that it's always someone else's fault. Rather, as if there are not enough real opponents out there, in the world of Israel advocacy, the fault always seems to lie with one of our own.

> 'We should aim our barbs at our foes, not our friends'

Of course, there are and always have been Jewish spokespeople who take anti-Israel or anti-Jewish-community positions on matters of public affairs. But that is not the issue of the moment. The problem we now encounter is that of people on the same side of the coin casting blame on each other. One is reminded of Woody Allen's monologue about relationships in the movie Sleeper, where he comes to one overriding conclusion: "We all get on each other's nerves sooner or later."

There is nothing wrong with Jewish groups taking different approaches to policy issues, or coming at Israeli politics from differing ideological perspectives. The Jewish community is intellectually well endowed, and thinking people need not always agree on every contentious point. The Knesset itself more than demonstrates this fact. We will never master the political equivalent of Riverdance, which Jackie Mason describes as "87 gentiles doing one step."

However, the trend of faulting our allies instead of our adversaries eventually leads to paralysis rather than an improvement of ideas. Indeed, one can say of community advocates what Mordecai Richler once said of his life as an author: "Coming from Canada, being a writer and Jewish as well, I have impeccable paranoia credentials." Knowing this about ourselves, the least we can do is aim our barbs at our foes, not our friends.

Ed Morgan is a law professor at the University of Toronto and chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Call to attend special Slichot service

We, the rabbanim of our community, have come together to issue an urgent call to all community members to attend a special Slichot prayer on Sept. 14, motza'ei Shabbat (erev Yom Kippur) at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, beginning at 12:30 a.m. The evening will be preceded by a special address by Haham Amram Assayag and Haham Eliyahu Attias.

With the end of the fast approaching and Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur only a few days away, it is imperative for us to take a moment to reflect on the current state of Jews everywhere.

The events of the past year have been a painful reminder that we are still in exile and not in our true homeland, Israel. The ongoing intifadah, the Sept. 11 attacks and the burning and desecration of synagogues around the world are just a few of the events of the past year that have highlighted the ever-growing need for Am Yisrael to set our individual differences aside and unite as an am echad, keish echad, belev echad.

When Jews in France can no longer walk the streets without the fear of being spit upon or when Israeli families live in fear that their next trip to the shuk may be their last, we must identify with their pain and anguish as if it was our own.

During these trying times, the need for us to come together to unite and pray to God as a community has never been stronger. We will read in the Amidah of Rosh Hashanah, "Vya'asu kulam agudah achat la'asot retzoncha belevav shalem" – "and they will join one group to do Your will wholeheartedly."

Our sages tell us that the sanctity of a community praying together exceeds the sum of its individual parts. A community's prayers have the ability to transcend to places in heaven where an individual's prayer alone cannot.

May it be the will of God that in the merit of this great gathering, we will see these trying times come to an end, that we be judged favourably in the year to come, that all our hopes and prayers are answered and that we bear witness to the coming of the Messiah.

We urge you to come and experience Slichot the Sephardi way.

Haham Amram Assayag, Rabbi Eliyahu Attias, Rabbi Y. Ozic, Rabbi O. Haboucha, Rabbi Shalom Revah, Rabbi Mordechai Sevy, Moshe Ben Yair, Jack Azriel, Rabbi Asher Abitbol and Victor Pinto.

Apples and honey make tasty treats

The Jewish Theological Seminary of America has sent along the following recipes from Devorah Buhr, a recent graduate of JTS's H.L. Miller Cantorial School.

Buhr, ritual service director and chazzan sheni of Kehillath Israel in Brookline, Mass., is an award-winning, certified pastry chef with a specialty in chocolate and candy production.

HONEY ALMOND CRUNCH

1 cup unsalted butter
1½ cups sugar
½ cup water
⅓ cup honey
2 cups almond (raw)

In a saucepan, melt butter. Add sugar, water, honey, and cook to 220 degrees on a candy thermometer. Add nuts and stir while you cook it to hard crack or 300 degrees. Meanwhile, spray a baking sheet with non-stick spray. When the toffee is up to temperature, pour it out onto the pan. When cooled, break into pieces and store in an airtight container.

APPLE FRUIT LEATHER

4 cups applesauce
1 cup sugar

Place a piece of foil on a baking sheet and spray with non-stick pan spray. Spread the applesauce-sugar mixture evenly about ⅛-inch thick. Place in a very slow oven (175 degrees) overnight or until dehydrated. When cooled, peel off foil and place on plastic film. Roll up into rolls ready to eat.

Waterloo U professor heads Cairo Genizah project

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The University of Waterloo has become the administrative centre of one of the world's most important Jewish studies research projects.

A team of scholars from a consortium of universities, ranging from Cambridge and Princeton to Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University, is working on the project to study the contents of the Cairo Genizah.

The project's director, James Diamond, holds the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo. He also directs the university's Jewish studies program.

The Cairo Genizah is a treasure trove of more than one million documents and texts from the Middle Ages about Jewish life and thought.

It was was found by British scholar Solomon Schechter at the turn of the last century in the dusty attic of the Ben Ezra synagogue in old Cairo.

In Hebrew, the word genizah refers to a room attached to a synagogue where books and ritual objects, inscribed with the name of God, are stored.

Illuminated page of a child's alphabet primer, circa 11th century.

The genizah in Cairo – once home to a thriving Jewish community – was originally found by a European scholar in the mid-18th century.

For superstitious reasons, he was barred from examining its contents.

In 1896, Schechter, having examined the genizah, took about 100,000 pages back to Britain.

The genizah's contents, in languages from Hebrew and Aramaic to Arabic and Judaic Persian, are today scattered among various libraries in the world, said Diamond.

Illuminated Haggadah with zoomorphic figures, circa 14th century.

To this day, 40 per cent of it remains uncatalogued and unpublished.

The material in the genizah includes biblical texts and commentaries, biblical and rabbinic dictionaries, as well as poetry, liturgy, philosophical treatises, polemical tracts, autographs of great Jewish thinkers such as Maimonides, public and private correspondence, commercial documents and deeds.

Diamond said the genizah, the subject of a five-volume analysis by Israeli orientalist S.D. Goitein, contains the largest collection of texts bearing on the Jewish encounter with Islam during the Middle Ages.

"This provides an opportunity for Jewish and Muslim scholars to interact and exchange ideas and research, since there is so much shared history in the genizah.

"A beautiful image of co-operation between Judaism and Islam is the language in which a large proportion of these documents are written – Judeo-Arabic."

Working with microfilm copies, the University of Waterloo's genizah project seeks to meet several objectives:

- to transcribe as many fragments as possible;
- to translate texts and make them available in a variety of formats;
- to digitize the entire collection;
- to produce a catalogue of all the genizah's fragments;

Jewish Campus Services responds to anti-Israel bias

By JEFF BERCUSON
Special to The CJN

In response to a growing anti-Israel bias on campuses throughout Canada, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is significantly expanding its role in Toronto student life.

"Campus has become a major forum for anti-Israel propaganda," says JCS assistant executive director Pearl Gropper Berman. "The anti-Israel sentiment is getting much stronger and much more overt. We have a big issue on campus."

Gropper Berman cites two recent incidents that have attracted attention and prompted JCS to increase its campus role.

The first incident involves the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies (at U of T) director Sherene Razack, who distributed a petition among her colleagues, with an accompanying cover letter denouncing Israel for "the current atrocities perpetrated against the Palestinians." Prof. Razack signed the letter using her position as the OISE centre's director and she signed the petition noting her affiliation with the University of Toronto.

The second incident, also at U of T, involves the Arts and Science Students Union's recently published Anti-Calendar that was dedicated to the "memory of the Innocents, Afghanistan and Palestine murdered," with no mention of Israeli victims.

Armed with a substantial increase in funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, JCS plans to provide U of T students, as well as students of York University, Ryerson University and Seneca College with more Israel-oriented programming and programs to increase awareness of important Jewish issues.

"JCS is going to be much more visible this year, and will help Jewish students feel more comfortable on campus," says Gropper Berman. "We want students to know that they can turn to JCS for the tools and information they need to support and defend Israel.

"The federation was very responsive to the needs of students in Toronto," she adds. "We are very grateful that the community has shown a vested interest in Jewish campus life."

JCS is also planning a number of seminars, shabbatonim, trips and community service events through Tzedek Hillel, its branch dedicated to social action and justice, she says. While each of these programs are aimed at providing students with fun, enriching social opportunities, JCS remains focused on its goal of "enhancing the profile of Jewish organizations and instilling pride in Jewish students across Toronto."

But its most importantly purpose this year is to quell the anti-Israel sentiment slowly pervading campus life.

"This year, Israel is our official number-one priority," says Gropper Berman.

She cites education, understanding and awareness as the keys to reducing anti-Semitism on campus, noting that in the past, Palestinian students have been more outspoken than Jewish students in support of their Mideast counterparts.

"Our biggest concern is the fact that many Jewish students simply don't have the tools or information they need to fight back," she says. "Many feel intimidated or scared to debate the issues with Palestinian students or professors. That is what we're trying to change."

Gropper Berman says she and her staff are planning a number of conferences in Toronto, Ottawa and Israel this year that are aimed at promoting campus advocacy and providing students with a forum to discuss different issues and gather information.

"These conferences promote a more pro-active approach to representing Jewish feelings," she says. "There really is strength in numbers, and these conferences show that Jewish students across Toronto and Canada are a united entity and are not fragmented."

According to JCS director of Israel Advocacy Jordana Ballas, it is especially important for the academic Jewish community to respond to criticism of Israel.

"We look at a university campus as a microcosm for society," says Ballas. "Community strength should be reflected on campus and vice versa."

Both Gropper Berman and Ballas are optimistic about the upcoming school year.

"It's been a tough time," Gropper Berman admits. "But thanks to UJA, we've been provided with a wonderful opportunity to give back to the community that has been so generous. We're really excited about this year."

"Everyone is really encouraged about the upcoming year," Ballas adds. "Jewish campus life is truly going to thrive."

Waterloo prof heads genizah project

Jim Diamond

• to encourage and stimulate genizah scholarship.
• to develop a better understanding of the contacts between Islam and Judaism from the eighth century to the 15th century CE.

Diamond said the project is expected to be finished within four years.

Sixty five people, divided into 12 teams, will scour the genizah contents.

They will deal with topics ranging from language and philosophy to social and cultural history.

Diamond will be in charge of such functions as quality control and database hosting.

He will also check the scholarly productivity of the teams, co-ordinate their work and edit a journal of genizah studies.

The project was made possible by the sponsorship of Albert Friedberg, a Toronto businessman originally from Uruguay who donated rare Jewish manuscripts to the University of Toronto.

David Johnston, president of the University of Waterloo, and Robert Kerton, the university's dean, have been fully behind the project, Diamond said.

Fewer births blamed for school enrolment decline

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Board of Jewish Education business manager Jack Cipilinsky cites lower birth rates in the community for the continuing decline in enrolment at Grey Academy, Winnipeg's principal Jewish day school.

Grey Academy – consisting of the JK to Grade 6 Shore Elementary School and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the city's only Jewish high school – has a total enrolment this year of 590, compared to 637 last September and 660 the year before.

"We budgeted for the decrease in enrolment," Cipilinsky said.

This year, Grey Academy's overall enrolment decline is due to a smaller number of students registering for kindergarten and the early grades, which Cipilinsky attributes to a declining number of births in Winnipeg's Jewish community over the last few years.

In the past, the high school has experienced larger enrolment drops from year to year, as students opted for the University of Winnipeg High School program after Grade 10 or St. John's-Ravenscourt School, Winnipeg's top private school, after Grade 7.

He said Grey Academy, which charges tuition, was looking forward to more new students arriving this year from Argentina. Twenty to 25 Jewish families from Argentina have immigrated to Winnipeg in the past few years and more are en route.

But due to delays in the immigration process, some who were expected to arrive for September aren't scheduled to arrive until January, Cipilinsky said.

"Maybe some are waiting to see if the economy in Argentina improves," he suggested.

Laurie Tighe, principal of Brock Corydon Elementary School, said three of the Argentine families have enrolled their children in the public school's free half-day Hebrew bilingual program.

Winnipeg's principal Jewish school examined

The program is the Shore Elementary School's principal competition for Jewish students in south Winnipeg. Tighe said there are 169 students in the bilingual program, a number that hasn't changed much for several years.

The third and newest south Winnipeg Jewish day school is the more Orthodox Ohr HaTorah, which holds classes at the Herzlia Synagogue. This year, the growing school has more than 60 students, about twice as many as last year, and, as of last week, up to 10 more were still considering enrolling.

The nursery to Grade 5 school, which is affiliated with the Torah Mesorah movement, has 22 children in its nursery program and 14 in kindergarten.

Rabbi Yacov Benamou, Ohr Hatorah's principal, said the school has attracted students from Brock Corydon and Grey Academy, as well as from families new to the city.

"We offer a warm, welcoming environment and teachers who live what they teach," he said.

Margaret Park Elementary School's Hebrew bilingual program, the main Jewish day school in north Winnipeg, has an enrolment of 91 students this year, a drop of about 10 from last year.

Kindergarten registration was considerably less than expected but principal Pat Stefanchuk is optimistic that the numbers will be higher next year according to current projections. Like Brock Corydon, Margaret Park is a public school that offers a free half-day Hebrew program.

Chabad also has a north Winnipeg day school, but its very small number of students are drawn mainly from Chabad-affiliated families.

Jewish Education... on the Move

From the BJE

No, we're not moving, but we are on the move. As you will learn from this exciting supplement, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) services every aspect of Jewish education in the GTA. We provide tuition subsidies to deserving families, consult to schools, work with principals and school administrators, train teachers, offer media and high-tech support and fund curricular innovation. But our lay leaders and professionals also have their eyes on the future through strategic planning for unmet needs.

To meet our objectives, we're asking many crucial questions. With some 17,000 children enrolled in our day and supplementary schools, can we not find a Jewish educational setting for every Jewish child? Why are some parents not enrolling their children in Jewish schools? Are children with special needs properly cared for in our schools and youth programs? How do we ensure that Jewish education is a life-long activity?

We want to work with our community to find suitable answers to these urgent questions and to instill in everyone a love of Jewish learning.

May the New Year be a year of Jewish exploration, of closer attachment to Jewish values. May the High Holidays bring you, your loved ones and all the Jewish people, peace, health and happiness.

School Solidarity With Israel

In all grades and at all levels, Israel is at the forefront for Jewish school students. So how are our children expressing their close connections to Israel?

✦ Thousands of Toronto students signed a special Declaration of Solidarity scroll which was presented to their Israeli counterparts.

✦ Several schools raised funds to purchase ambulances for Magen David Adom. Associated Hebrew Schools students collected $98,000 by joining the Read-for-a-Need Drive. United Synagogue Day Schools undertook an initiative that allowed parents to honour their childrens' teachers with a contribution to Magen David Adom and CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) students raised ambulance funds as well.

✦ Associated Hebrew Schools Art Program students designed postcards that were distributed to 8,000 Toronto Jewish school students for mailing to soldiers and children in Israel.

✦ Each branch of United Synagogue Day Schools adopted families in Israel and raised funds to provide for their needs.

✦ Building on its Shavua Yisrael program, Netivot HaTorah is introducing a new Israel Studies Curriculum throughout all grades. Two B'not Sherut (young Israeli women performing National Service) will add to the school's Israeli atmosphere.

✦ To commemorate Yom Ha'Atzmaut, students at CHAT Richmond Hill immersed themselves in all-day seminars on a wide range of issues related to Israel today.

✦ Leo Baeck Day School created a wonderful connection with another school in UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 twin communities of Eilat-Elot.

✦ Four grade 8 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School organized a raffle that raised more than $2000 for Kids for Kids which assists child victims of terror.

✦ Students at Temple Sinai Supplementary School, along with numerous other schools, assembled and shipped boxes of toiletries and treats to IDF soldiers.

The BJE's website (www.bjetoronto.org) includes ideas on how to help Israel in these difficult times, and a web lesson,
The Situation in Israel, geared to Grades 7-12 students.

Facing Forward

The Toronto Jewish community, which leads the way in its devotion to Jewish education, has illustrated its zeal by investing heavily in teacher education, innovative teaching techniques and tuition subsidies. "Our future is in the hands of our children. We need to make sure that they are connected to their Jewish heritage and develop both an interest and desire to pass that on to future generations," says Shirley Worth, Director Donor Development for UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative. To find out more about how you can help fund the future of Jewish education, call Shirley Worth at 416.631.5837.

Conferences Benefit Both Teachers and Families

It was a busy summer for BJE-sponsored conferences, benefiting both teachers and families:

✦ Mishpacha Institute of Toronto (MIT), August 18-21 - A four-day intensive course for 50 Jewish family educators from supplementary and day schools. It was an exploration of family education and pluralistic text study on the theme of Ahavat Tzion (the love of Zion). Jewish Family Educators strive to transmit Jewish heritage to the whole family, through participation in a variety of specially designed learning opportunities. "We hope that MIT will continue to draw upon the talents in our Jewish Family Educators' Network and will serve as an ongoing resource in our community," said Co-Directors Anne Glickman and Ruth Rohn.

✦ Opening the Doors Conference, July 14-16, co-sponsored by Camp Ramah - Thirty participants came from diverse sectors of the community, including professionals, people with disabilities and the parents of people with disabilities. "One of the goals of the conference was to devise means to tackle the barriers that prevent inclusion of Jewish people with disabilities," said Debbie Gladstone, Director of Tikkun Chaim. The participants also looked at an inventory of community services for those with disabilities.

✦ Bet Midrash Elul, Jerusalem - Twelve Toronto educators spent two weeks immersed in outstanding textual study through which shared values and ideas emerged.

✦ August Teacher Workshops - More than 140 teachers attended a variety of end-of-summer workshops held at BJE, ranging from special needs to teaching Jewish history and literacy.

Serving Jewish Education Needs

Excellence in education doesn't just happen. It takes the commitment of dedicated schools, devoted teachers and a supportive community to make sure we are equipping our children with the tools to grow into the best adults they can be. Together with our community's educational institutions, BJE's initiatives have opened the doors for children to explore their Jewish heritage. Here are some facts to consider:

- BJE invested over $10 million from the UJA Federation Campaign in Jewish education last year.
- BJE allocated some $7 million in tuition subsidies so that Jewish families could provide a day school education for 2500 children.
- BJE also invested $500,000 in a variety of services and grants for supplementary schools.
- BJE established Tikun Chaim to better serve gifted children and children with special needs.

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education is deeply grateful to the Berman Fund, the Ab & Phyllis Flatt Family Endowment Fund, the Goldberg Family, the Goodman-Gross Family, the Shiff Family, the Saul S. Wagman Fund and the Max & Beatrice Wolfe Charitable Foundation for making many of our programs possible.

Drug abuse in Jewish community

When the disease isn't discussed, it becomes an embarrassment that isn't understood. Holidays such as Simchat Torah can trigger week-long binges and despair.

In addition, having an addict in the family in a tight-knit, observant community can stand in the way of successful shiduchim (arranged marriages), increasing the tendencies for those affected to deny the problem.

Rotenberg points out that some yeshivot have initiated addiction education programs, such as Ohr Samayach's Kesher project.

With their new teen program, JACS is hoping to further increase awareness and provide encouragement for adolescents and young adults in recovery.

Jewish holidays can trigger week-long binges

"We want to provide a place for kids where the doors are open and they can come in whenever they want. Some of the younger kids just need somewhere they can feel accepted," Goldman said.

Some schools and yeshivot impose zero tolerance policies and expel students for all drug-related incidents, but this is exactly when these kids and their families desperately need education and help, she said.

"Parents have this misconception that if their kids aren't doing well, they can fix them by writing a cheque and making everything OK. Unfortunately, when it comes to drugs, parents can't fix their kids. The children need to want to be helped so that they can fix themselves," Goldman said.

JACS offers addicts and their families a place to come to some understanding about what is happening to them by "connecting with each another, exploring their Jewish roots and discovering resources within Judaism to enhance their recovery."

The 12-step program used is based on Torah principles and a strong emphasis is placed on spirituality and the belief in God, Goldman said. The second step points out that "a power greater than ourselves can restore us to sanity."

JACS' focus on the fundamental principle of anonymity allows for anyone to come into the building at 858 Sheppard Ave. E. and feel secure that their problems won't leave its four walls.

And sometimes a cup of coffee and a few friendly faces waiting to speak to you at the end of the day about a problem that may be consuming your life can help. Even if it's just to see that you're not alone.

Israeli consulate spared – again

Avital said the Israeli government was not preparing any official announcement about Montreal or the two other diplomatic missions staying open.

"This is the official announcement," he said.

But there appeared little doubt that intensive lobbying by the Jewish community and politicians played a decisive role in Israel's Foreign Ministry reconsidering its July 22 closure announcement.

Those said to have intervened included FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, Senator Leo Kolber and Charles Bronfman, a longtime friend of Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Shlomo Avital

The campaign also included Jewish community petitions, and requests to reconsider by figures such as Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay, Quebec's International Relations Minister Louise Beaudoin and Quebec Liberal leader Jean Charest.

Graham said he was urged by Kolber and local MP Irwin Cotler to intercede. After hearing "why the consulate was of particular importance to the Jewish community," he said he contacted Peres personally. His Israeli counterpart described the severe cost constraints the Foreign Ministry was experiencing, but Graham said he was left with the impression Peres was doing all he could to save the consulate.

Those lobbying for the consulate underscored the distinct role the institution plays in Montreal and Quebec in catering to the province's six million francophones.

Graham said Quebec is "a francophone jurisdiction that has particular ties to Israel... There's a francophone community in Israel itself and there's a real interest between Quebec and the Montreal Jewish community and Israel that goes back in time.

"I think it's important to maintain those links," he said. "There's a consulate in Toronto. It's important that Montreal also have a consulate."

According to Rabbi Poupko, the Israeli government finally "understood the absolute need to keep the consulate open at a time when the perception of Israel in not what it should be.

"It shows that our support for Israel is valued and appreciated, that when we speak with a united voice, we are listened to."

In 1998, the consulate faced a similar threat of closure, but stayed open after Bronfman and the Jewish community intervened. Unlike 1998, however, this time it came right down to the wire.

According to one source, the decision to spare the consulate was made over the objections of Israel's Finance Ministry, now under intense pressure to pare the government budget across the board.

As reported last month in The CJN, Peres and Sharon asked the ministry to try to find the money necessary to keep the Montreal consulate open – about $1.2 million (US) annually.

But according to the source, Peres held little sway with the Finance Ministry, particularly its high-ranking bureaucrats who make the decisions.

It was Sharon who "finally banged on the table" and ordered the ministry to come up with the money, the source said.

"Peres didn't win the battle. Sharon had to do it."

Avital said that with the consulate staying open, it was unclear whether he would be taking on the post of ambassador to Senegal. News of his appointment coincided with the closure announcement.

One possibility was that Avital, who arrived in Montreal in 1999, would stay on for another year. Another was that he would depart for Senegal, and be temporarily replaced by Israeli consul Nina Ben-Ami.

Whatever the case, Avital said there seemed little doubt that the Israeli government came to realize the importance of the Israeli consulate to the Jewish community in Montreal and for maintaining important ties with Quebec.

Where is the balance on CBC television?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

CBC's commitment to balance was thrown into relief through some revealing comments last month by Paul Workman, a former Mideast correspondent now based in Paris who still reports occasionally from the Middle East for The National and other CBC news programs.

Interviewed by Ian Hanomansing about the focus and nature of his journalism for Foreign Assignment (Aug. 4), Workman first described his experiences covering the plight of Afghan refugees in Pakistan. ("The poorest among the Afghan refugees here beg or scavenge just to survive. I've seen camps in the Gaza Strip that seem luxurious compared to this neighbourhood," he said.) Attention then turned to excerpts from his report in Bethlehem, done surreptitiously during Israel's closure of the city in the spring. His story graphically detailed the devastation of a Palestinian family – the mistaken killing by the Israel Defence Forces of a mother and her son and the destruction of their dwelling.

Hanomansing remarked: "Paul, in your years as a foreign correspondent, you've obviously been to Bethlehem many times, but never a Bethlehem like this."

Workman: "... it wasn't the Bethlehem I remember... blackened buildings, bombed-out buildings, lots of garbage all over the streets. The European Union had spent millions of dollars redoing the old city of Bethlehem for the millennium, and in a matter of a week, all of that has been undone."

Interestingly, there is no Israeli context about why all this happened, no reference to the spate of suicide attacks, some launched from Bethlehem itself, that were inflicted on Israelis. Where was the balance? On this vital subject Hanomansing asked: "How do you try to achieve balance when you do a story like this one, when you're talking to people who are trapped on one side of this conflict, trapped in their homes?"

With rare exception, Israeli suffering is not covered

Workman's blunt reply is illuminating: "I didn't try at all to achieve balance in this story. That wasn't our intention. Balance, I think, is a larger picture. Our coverage, I'm sure, balances out very well when you add in all of the material that comes out of the Middle East."

Last week's column dealt with a glaring imbalance in Neil Macdonald's reports during August. It's hard to imagine how CBC reporters can feel so assured about the achievement of balance when "the story" they pursue is basically one about Israel's alleged oppression of the Palestinians, an oppression often made to seem wilful, deliberate, insensitive and carried out in the absence of alternative remedies against a largely innocent people.

Workman defended his one-sided account as "an effective piece of journalism, because people really wanted to know from the Palestinians what they'd suffered, what they'd gone through – really through no cause of their own."

And what about Israeli suffering – the hundreds killed and thousands maimed in suicide bombings after the Israeli government offered statehood to the Palestinians?

With rare exception, this is not covered by the CBC. There is, in effect, no true balance over time – let alone at any one time.

Muslim group apologizes for anti-Semitism on Web

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A Concordia University Muslim student group has apologized for its Web site's links to anti-Semitic material, including blatant Holocaust denial and Henry Ford's 1922 treatise The International Jew.

But the group defends the link to a pro-Hezbollah site on which a Muslim scholar condones, on religious grounds, suicidal attacks against civilians.

The Student Association for Muslim Awareness (SAMA) issued the apology to the Concordia Student Union (CSU) council of representatives and the students of Concordia on Aug. 29 after the council passed a resolution condemning SAMA for its Web site's anti-Semitic content.

SAMA stated it "unequivocally condemn[s] anti-Semitism along with all other forms of discrimination. Indeed, we feel that the Jewish people have undergone unimaginable persecution and suffering, which culminated in the evil Nazi Holocaust that claimed the lives of over six million Jews.

"We think that there is no excuse for minimizing or denying this historic tragedy."

It continues: "SAMA holds holy and dear the belief that racism, oppression and the exploitation of all people around the world must be fought against with tenacity and courage, and one example of this resolve is the courage of the Jewish resistance in the Warsaw Ghetto in 1943."

Link to pro-Hezbollah site defended

Its explanation for the presence of the material was that the Web site was "inherited" from the group's previous executive and its full content had not been reviewed by the new leaders.

"We regret the fact that we have waited this long to examine the Web site and all its links."

The SAMA site is now "under construction" and no longer accessible.

Although the SAMA site was hosted by Concordia's server, it is not a registered student group this year, nor was it last year, but it was two years ago, a spokesperson for the dean of students office confirmed.

SAMA did not apologize for the site's link to www.bayynat.org, which contains musings by Sayyed Mohammed Hussein Fadlullah, a Muslim religious authority based in Lebanon with ties to the Hezbollah, that "martyr operations" can be rationalized under Islamic law and those who oppose suicidal bombings are violating that law.

SAMA argued that this site "deals with all the imaginable issues that have come up in Muslim debates and controversies between Muslim jurisprudence.

"These range from the most correct posture during prayers to suicide bombings, which is an issue of debate between Muslim scholars both in the Islamic world and in North America."

The apology ended defiantly: "We denounce any attempt at portraying SAMA as racist or other such rhetoric that certain fear-mongers have adopted of late."

Raphael Lallouz, regional community relations director of B'nai Brith Canada, which brought to public attention the SAMA site, said he finds that remark "perplexing.

"I find it a little out of place. I'm not sure who they are referring to," he said.

In general, Lallouz said the apology is "very welcome" and its overall content positive. "It's a big step forward... I think they realized they had no choice but to apologize," he said.

But Lallouz is disappointed with SAMA's refusal to acknowledge that it was wrong to proliferate material that sanctions terrorism.

Lallouz is also leery about the apology's reference to the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

"Are they trying to draw a parallel between the ghetto fighters and the Palestinian terrorists or, worse, between Israel and the Nazis? It's troubling."

He also finds the excuse that the new SAMA executive "inherited" the site unconvincing. "Even if none of them were involved with the former executive, the new president had the whole summer to review the content of the site."

At the same council meeting that SAMA presented the apology, the CSU council earlier unanimously adopted a resolution demanding that SAMA issue a "formal and public apology."

The council condemned the site's linked material for being anti-Semitic and for denying the Holocaust. The resolution did not make any reference to the Muslim scholar's opinions on suicide attacks.

Concordia student Noah Joseph, co-president of Hillel and a CSU council member, was not critical of the apology.

He hopes that SAMA's and the CSU council's response to the controversy bodes well for relations between Muslim and Jewish students at Concordia this year.

"After the president of SAMA read the apology and sat down, I crossed the room and extended my hand, which he shook. Hopefully, this is a sign of things to come. Also the CSU motion, which I seconded, passed unanimously.

"It's rare for the council to pass anything without dissension."

Joseph also noted that Samer Elatrash, an activist with Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, a student group which has led the pro-Palestinian activity on campus, made a speech that commended the apparently improved climate.

Concordia Rector Frederick Lowy wrote to B'nai Brith that the university is "satisfied that SAMA and the CSU council have acted appropriately in this matter and that no further action is required."

Lowy's letter reprints the SAMA apology but excludes the last paragraph in which SAMA defends the disseminating of the Muslim scholar's defence of suicide attacks.

Lallouz said it is unclear whether Lowy received the full statement SAMA made to the CSU, or if Lowy or SAMA edited the original apology.

He said B'nai Brith will likely pursue the matter further.

Israel a factor in Iraq debate, but Jewish state keeps quiet

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Israel is trying to keep a low profile in the American debate over whether to attack Iraq, but the Jewish State figures prominently in both sides' arguments.

Those in favour of action say Iraqi President Saddam Hussein may have weapons of mass destruction and might be willing to use them to exert power in the Middle East.

Those arguing against an attack say it would be too costly and is tangential to the U.S. war on terrorism – and that, in any case, there is little evidence that Saddam is an imminent threat.

Analysis

On each side, there is debate about the effect an attack on Iraq would have on U.S. "allies in the region," an implicit reference to Israel.

It's unclear what weapons of mass destruction Saddam may hold and whether he has the technical capacity to unleash them on Israel.

But Israel is taking no chances. Fearing that Iraq will again lash out at Israel if attacked – as it did in the 1991 Gulf War – Israel already is purchasing gas masks and has considered inoculating its entire population against smallpox.

Israel also asked its security and emergency services to complete preparations by Nov. 1 for a possible Iraqi retaliatory strike to a U.S. attack.

The United States has not told Israel if or when it will attack Iraq, but Nov. 1 seemed a "reasonable" deadline for preparations, a senior U.S. official told the Associated Press.

While neither side in the American debate is publicly discussing the Israeli angle at length, "people on both sides" are using "the implications for Israel to support their arguments," said David Makovsky, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Those who favour an attack highlight the threat Saddam poses to the Middle East.

The most senior members of the Bush administration, including vice-president Dick Cheney, have addressed various media outlets in the past few weeks about the need to deal imminently with the increasing danger posed by the Iraqi dictator to the United States and the West.

In a speech Cheney also suggested that after Saddam was defeated, the "Israeli-Palestinian peace process would be enhanced, just as it was following the liberation of Kuwait in 1991."

Yet those opposed to an attack say it would destabilize the Middle East and cause increased Arab frustration to boil over onto Israel.

Those opposed to action note that, if attacked, Saddam is likely to attack Israel and that the United States, in effect, would be sacrificing Israel's welfare by attacking Iraq, some say.

"Israel would have to expect to be the first casualty, as in 1991 when [Saddam] sought to bring Israel into the Gulf conflict," former U.S. National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft wrote in the Wall Street Journal on Aug. 15.

"This time, using weapons of mass destruction, he might succeed, provoking Israel to respond, perhaps with nuclear weapons, unleashing an Armageddon in the Middle East."

Some even warn that U.S. support for Israel could be viewed as the reason for an attack against Iraq.

"Sadly, in international politics, as in domestic politics, perception is sometimes more important than reality," former U.S. secretary of state James Baker wrote in the New York Times on Aug. 25. "We cannot allow our policy toward Iraq to be linked to the Arab-Israeli dispute, as Hussein will cynically demand, just as he did in 1990 and 1991."

Analysts say both sides have a point: Israel most likely will be profoundly affected by U.S. action against Iraq; it's just not clear exactly how.

Michael Rubin, a visiting scholar with the American Enterprise Institute, says the threat Saddam poses to Israel will only increase if the United States does not act.

"Many people say 'Don't put Hussein's back against the wall, he might lash out,'" Rubin said. "But if Hussein feels there is no consequence for consistent flouting of ceasefire resolutions, it can get much more dangerous for Israel."

Iraq poses an imminent threat to Israel because of Saddam's financial support for terrorist organizations that target Israel and the growing concern that he could give groups chemical or biological weapons to one of the those, Rubin said.

For now, Israel and Jewish groups have largely remained on the sidelines of the American debate, even when it relates to the effect an attack would have on Israel.

Survey: Anti-Semitism is on rise in Germany

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — A new survey showing that anti-Semitism is on the rise in Germany has been released as the country witnessed its third anti-Semitic attack in seven days. The vandalizing of a Jewish cemetery in the town of Buetzow in northeastern Germany was apparently carried out by neo-Nazis, police said last week.

The survey of 1,001 people in eastern Germany and 1,050 in the West also found that more than a quarter of people said they believe Jewish influence is too great and 17 per cent of Germans believe Hitler would be viewed as a great statesman if it weren't for the Holocaust causing the death of six million Jews.

In one finding that contradicts popular opinion, researchers at the University of Leipzig and Berlin's Free University said the increase in anti-Semitic feelings was greater in western Germany than in the former communist east.

"The question is: Why is there such a rise in the west?" said Elmar Braehler of Leipzig University. "One could say that the West Germans always thought this, but it was taboo – we don't know for sure."

Increased tensions in the Middle East and open criticism of Israel could be behind the loosening of inhibitions in expressing anti-Semitic sentiment, he said.

The number of respondents who agreed with that view in the West was 19 per cent – up five per cent from 1994. Eastern respondents remained steady at eight per cent. The survey had a margin of error of less than two percentage points.

Diedre Berger, Berlin director of the American Jewish Committee, said the survey backs up statistically what Jewish organizations have observed anecdotally for several years.

"The problem of right-wing extremism and anti-Semitism in western Germany has sometimes been given less attention due to the continuing acute violence in eastern Germany, but just because there is less violence in western Germany doesn't mean that there is not a problem with anti-Semitic and right- wing extremist attitudes," Berger said.

Despite Germany's efforts to confront the Holocaust, Berger said anti-Semitism in society has been overlooked.

"I think it's time to start confronting the fact that anti-Semitic clichés and metaphors have been ingrained in German and European society and should be addressed," Berger said.

In findings that support that, some 28 per cent said Jewish influence is too great, while another 32 per cent partially agreed. Overall, 53 per cent of the respondents either agreed or partially agreed with the statement that "more than others, Jews cheat and use tricks in their work in order to get what they want."

German authorities have posted a 10,000 euro reward for clues leading to an arrest in the worst anti-Semitic attack on a Holocaust memorial in a decade, the fire-bombing of a museum honouring the victims of a Nazi death march.

The attack last Thursday night destroyed the main exhibition of the death march museum in the Belower Woods, which detailed how the Nazis drove concentration camp inmates deeper into Germany as the Soviet Army advanced at the end of World War II.

Outside the museum, vandals painted a big red swastika and two SS symbols on a memorial, and an anti-Semitic slogan one metre high and six metres long along the base of a large memorial column.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon

'We refuse to surrender our hope'

Dear Friends, From Jerusalem, the eternal and undivided capital of the Jewish people, I send you my warmest greetings for a happy, healthy and prosperous new year.

The past year has been one of many challenges for the State of Israel. Though we are fighting a war imposed upon us, we refuse to surrender our hope for eventual peace with our neighbors, thus insisting that terrorism and incitement be stopped before negotiations can ultimately commence. And yet, as we enter the year 5763, I am certain that your unwavering solidarity with the people of Israel will enable us to overcome all obstacles that lie ahead.

This is the time for all Jews to unite. As we defend our home, our birthright and our very existence, this is the time for you to come to Israel. We share a mutual responsibility to stand together, and Israel needs your support now. In our common struggle for democracy and freedom, the terrorists who threaten our way of life must be defeated. Still, we must never forget that Israel is the only place in the world where Jews have the right and the capability to defend themselves by themselves. This right and capability must be preserved to guarantee the survival, security and birthright of Jews everywhere.

On this Rosh Hashanah, I pray that the coming year will bring the blessing of peace with security. I am confident that, in unity, we can realize all our hopes and dreams.

'Israel is our dream'

It is impossible to look back on the year 5762 without feeling pain for the hundreds of Israelis who were murdered or maimed during the Palestinian terror campaign that is about to enter its third year. The outgoing year has been a difficult one.

Let us make a cheshbon nefesh, as Jews always do before Rosh Hashanah.... ...The intifadah appeared in three main forms these past twelve months, each with a special significance. The first form was the attacks in youth clubs, discotheques, schools and schoolbuses. In other words: the murder of our children. The second form was typified by the scores murdered last Pesach on the seder night. The third was the murder of foreign students, most notably at the Hebrew University just a few weeks ago.

The first attacks, on our children, signify our enemies' attempt to murder our future.

The second attacks, at the Pesach seder, signify an attempt to destroy our freedom, which all Jews celebrate at Passover.

The third type of attack, on students who came from abroad to study in Jerusalem, signified an attempt to sever the bonds that connect Israel with Jews all over the world.

We recall that the intifadah erupted around Rosh Hashanah two years ago – only a few weeks after our great hopes at Camp David. Indeed, the enemies of peace always strike when peace seems nearest. The plotters of the intifadah struck in the wake of our disappointment after Camp David, in a clear attempt to kill all that remained of our hopes to live with them in peace. If they succeed, if our enemies – God forbid – were ever to destroy our future, destroy our freedom, destroy our bond with the Jewish people and destroy our hopes to live in peace with our neighbours, they would attain their ultimate goal: the destruction of the promise of Israel, free, safe and a centre of peace for all Jews.

What, then, must be our response to the intifadah (in addition, of course, to the military response we all understand to be necessary)? How can we foil our enemies' plans? We can do so by redoubling our determination to build a strong and safe Israel that all Jews will be proud of. We can do so by refusing to give up our hope to live in peace with our neighbours. Though we bleed, though we hurt, though we have gone to more funerals this year than we ever imagined we would have, we do not despair. We do not lock ourselves in our homes. We continue to build. We go to work, we go to theatres, we go to concerts, football games and shul. We visit the sick and wounded and care for our poor. In brief, we continue to work to make our Jewish state a model, moral and modern one. What do we ask of you, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora? That you, too, redouble your efforts to make Israel strong, safe and free. We applaud your efforts to correct the disinformation spread by many of the foreign media about what is going on here. Please keep them up.

Rabbi Michael Melchior
Deputy Foreign Minister

We are overwhelmed and greatly heartened when we hear of volunteers such as Jewish doctors who spend their vacation time relieving their overworked Israeli counterparts in our emergency rooms and burn wards. Please continue to help.

Sadly, when we look towards the Diaspora for your help, we also see disturbing things. We see the frightening face of a new kind of anti-Semitism that is raising its ugly head even in the most enlightened, democratic countries. We see a new breed of anti-Semite who paints a false, villainous picture of Israel, and uses it to dehumanize all Jews by association. We are determined to mobilize moral people of all nations – Jews and non-Jews – to combat anti-Semitism, so that not a single anti-Semitic incident is tolerated or ignored. More than at any time since 1945, world Jewry must be aware of the danger. But now, unlike in 1945, there is a Jewish state, and Israel will not shirk its responsibility to help co-ordinate the fight against anti-Semitism, wherever it appears.

The year 5762 was, as I said, a difficult one. But its difficulties must not deter us. The dreams of the Jewish people are no less important and no less exciting because the outgoing year presented us with obstacles to attaining them. Here in Israel, we continue to live our dream. If our dream were not so great, perhaps we could be deterred.

That, I believe, is the essence of our enemies' mistake, and the reason they will not succeed. They cannot understand: Israel is not just a military/political entity, subject to terrorist pressure. Israel is our dream. Only we can understand the greatness of that dream, and the determination of all Jews to make it come true.

May the coming year, 5763, be a year in which we continue to meet and overcome the challenges inherent in Jewish life. May Jewish life in Israel and in every Jewish community abroad be fortified and enriched, and may we be privileged to finally witness Isaiah's prophecy: "How beautiful it is to hear from upon the mountains, the steps of him who brings good tidings, who speaks of peace; who brings good."

Arafat condemns all terror acts against Israeli civilians

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat told his parliament Monday that he condemns "every act of terror against Israeli civilians," but he did not say explicitly that the attacks must be halted.

In a speech closely watched for shifts in official Palestinian policy and to assess the extent of power he wields, Arafat also said the world expects a clear message from the Palestinian people that they are ready to negotiate peace with Israel and carry out internal reforms.

In the hour-long address to the Palestinian legislative council, Arafat said – in a joking aside apparently mocking his critics – that he was willing to give up executive powers if asked.

The appearance before the legislature, his first in 18 months, was considered a key test of his standing, sapped by growing external and internal criticism in recent months. He was seeking approval for a new cabinet and for reform plans sought by the United States and Israel.

Arafat said presidential, parliamentary and municipal elections would be held at the beginning of January. The United States has been seeking a delay in presidential elections in the hope of winning Palestinian agreement to install a prime minister who would take over the day-to-day affairs of government and turn Arafat into a figurehead. Arafat has resisted the idea of appointing a prime minister.

Addressing the Israeli public, Arafat called for new peace negotiations and said, "I would like to say that we want to achieve peace with you. We want security and stability for us and for you… This peace is still ahead of us."

Arafat's popularity has plummeted in recent months. Shunned by the United States, he has largely been confined to his headquarters in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

He said Palestinian attacks on civilians serve Israel's interest by drawing attention away from the suffering of the Palestinians under occupation. He also asked legislators to uphold the national interest, but did not specify what this would mean.

He opened the speech with references to 14 Gaza-based legislators whom Israel had barred from attending. Israel had accused the men of links to terror. Arafat mocked the Israeli move by noting that one of the lawmakers had died well before the order was given.

An advance draft version of the speech obtained by the Associated Press contained several paragraphs in which Arafat called for a ban on suicide bombings in Israel, but the speech he delivered did not include such a call.

Arafat said the world expects from the Palestinians a "clear stance and firm answers regarding peace with Israel and the Israeli peace, as well as with regard to democracy and reforms in our society.

"Our national interest is to preserve international support for our legitimate right to resist the military and settlement occupation," Arafat said. "We have to reiterate our condemnation of attacks against Israeli civilians and at the same time to any attacks against Palestinian civilians," he said.

Many Palestinian legislators, criticizing alleged widespread corruption in the Arafat-led Authority, have called for the longtime Palestinian leader to appoint a prime minister, who would take over many of Arafat's spheres of power.

The lawmakers were expected to vote on Arafat's proposed cabinet changes after hearing a speech by the Palestinian leader on "national, political and security matters."

U.S. worried by Libya's ambitions

Libya is considered to be in Egypt's "backyard," and it's doubtful Egypt could miss spotting extensive nuclear efforts. Egyptian leaders know that the U.S. administration suspects Libya is making efforts in that direction, and in light of this, the question becomes to what extent Egypt is aware of the efforts and what Cairo plans to do about them. Will it regard them as a threat to be prevented, will it ignore them, or will Cairo try to make indirect use of them?

The Libyan efforts came up in talks between Israeli and U.S. officials six months ago, when it became apparent to the Israelis that the Americans had acquired similar information to what Israel knows about Libya's nuclear ambitions.

U.S. Undersecretary for Arms Control and International Security John Bolton said in Washington, D.C., on May 5 that the United States "has no doubt" that Libya is continuing its efforts to acquire a nuclear weapon. He said the administration believes that after the sanctions lifted in 1999, Libya's access to nuclear technology increased.

But he added that while Libya needs foreign assistance to achieve its nuclear goals, there is reason to be concerned about the strengthening of Libya's nuclear infrastructure.

Bolton noted that on March 25, Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi told Al Jazeera TV that "we demanded the dismantling of Israel's weapons of mass destruction, otherwise the Arabs have the right to be equipped with the same weaponry."

Bolton described Libyan chemical weapons development, and spoke about the country's purchases of chemical materials in the Middle East, Asia and Western Europe, and noted that the Libyans had developed a ground-to-ground missile with the help of Serbia, India, North Korea and China.

But he also noted that Libya condemned the Sept. 11 terror attacks and that there had been great progress in its reduction of support for terror.

Bolton was recently in Israel, meeting with various people including Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan, the outgoing head of Israel's National Security Council.

Libya has been prominently listed on the U.S. State Department's list of states that support terrorism, but there was talk about removing it from the list this year to prove that the United States has a carrot-and-stick policy and that those countries that stop supporting terror will benefit.

But with discussions of Libya now including its nuclear ambitions, the State Department was forced to note in its annual report on terror that while Libya "apparently" has ceased support for international terror, there are still pockets of support for links with some groups.

Libya's agreement to a compensation program for families of the victims of the 1988 Pan Am bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, has also helped its image in the United States in recent years. Nonetheless, the nuclear issue has now begun to overshadow that progress.

Israel's concern is that Libya, which doesn't have long-distance missiles capable of reaching Israel, could use a plane, ship – or perhaps most dangerously – a terrorist group to deliver a nuclear weapon, if it does acquire one.

Israelis, Jews relieved as conference ends

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — As participants at the World Summit on Sustainable Development prepared to return home, Jewish and Israeli participants could breathe a sigh of relief.

The overall impression was that the summit, which ended last week on Wednesday, was generally positive for Israel – certainly nothing like last year's disastrous World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, when the atmosphere was so polluted by anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic attacks that the Israeli delegation eventually walked out.

This year, most Israeli and Jewish participants said, the Palestinians failed in their efforts to turn a conference on environmental issues into another Israel-bashing circus.

Analysis

"We feel very satisfied," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Sofer said. "The conference went well both from the point of view of sustainable development and from a purely Israeli point of view.

"Despite the atmosphere in one or two arenas, such as [last] Saturday's anti-globalization march, people didn't even know that the Israel-Palestinian issue was on the agenda," he added.

The summit, which was intended as a follow-up to an earth summit 10 years ago in Brazil, drew some 50,000 participants. They included a 42-member Israeli delegation and a 130-person Jewish caucus.

Israel's actual accomplishments were modest – it announced a joint project with Jordan to replenish the Dead Sea with water from the Red Sea – but the fact that a UN conference passed without withering attacks on Israel was taken as a victory.

While accusations of Israeli apartheid struck a chord with participants at last year's anti-racism conference, it's more of a stretch to tie Israeli policy toward the Palestinians to environmental degradation.

In addition, embarrassed by its handling of the Durban conference, South Africa this year restrained pro-Palestinian demonstrators, removing them by force when they tried to disrupt Israeli events in the conference's first days and blasting them with water cannons when they tried to prevent a speech by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

In stark contrast to the Palestinians' efforts, Israeli officials took a calculatedly mild line, stressing the need to turn away from conflict and toward co-operation. When Palestinian groups sought to shout them down, Israeli officials spoke of resuming the peace process.

The only reference to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the conference's final declaration was in paragraph 58, and it was oblique: "We reaffirm our opposition to foreign occupation and assert the right of all peoples to sovereignty and the control of their natural resources."

In fact, Sofer said, Israel was not mentioned explicitly in any of the official conference documents.

Sofer reflected the view of his boss, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who said Israel had come to deliver a message of environmental co-operation and had succeeded.

Yet not everyone agreed.

"What was begun in Durban has not ended here," said Shimon Samuels, director for international liaison at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Paris. "The undercurrents, despite all the important themes of the conference, the thrusts of foreign policy, are the same."

Samuels said South Africa seemed to be pandering to the radical nations of the Third World.

"What happened in Durban made the United Nations central to the new human rights theology, in which Israel is the anti-Christ," Samuels said.

Israel then becomes the villain in every story, whether the issue at hand is sustainable development, health or human rights, Samuels said.

"You are the enemy of mankind," Samuels said. "What is happening here on the" level of nongovernmental organizations "is exactly that continuation."

He was referring to several instances in which Palestinians and their supporters disrupted presentations by Israeli groups at a parallel NGO conference some 15 miles from the main conference site.

Unlike the situation in Durban, however, South African police swiftly broke up this year's anti-Israel protests.

On the official governmental level, Egypt, Algeria, Sudan and the Palestinians tried to place the issue of Israel's "occupation" of parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip at the forefront of the conference agenda, but without much success.

Overall, Samuels said, the conference had created opportunities and new relationships that should be followed up.

"I hope South Africa is able to celebrate this conference as an achievement in its post-apartheid period, despite the little clouds that went over the scene when [President Thabo] Mbeki had to bash one country and one country alone" at an anti-globalization march, Samuels said.

He was referring to pro-Palestinian comments Mbeki made at a rally that included demonstrators blasting Israel and praising suicide bombers.

But Russell Gaddin, national chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, was upbeat. The Board of Deputies played a major role on behalf of the community before the summit, lobbying the government and participating in preparatory NGO meetings.

"We can sense the frustration of the Palestinians because they could not hijack the summit," Gaddin said.

He was grateful to South African authorities for the steps they took to ensure that the Palestinians would not dominate the agenda and to make sure the conference was peaceful, both inside the venues and on the street.

Yehiel Leket, world chairman of the Jewish National Fund, agreed that dire predictions of Palestinian interference – which some said would force Israel to spend all its time defending itself rather than discussing sustainable development – failed to materialize.

How the Betel Centre gave Helen a new lease on her life

At first, she was anxious when she came to Toronto from Montreal. But her daughter showed her the Centre and everything changed -- for the better

Reggie Delovitch with her mother Helen Wierbski af the Bernard Betel Centre

Two years after her beloved husband, Leon, passed away in 1992, Helen Wierbski moved to Toronto to be closer to her only daughter, Reggie, and her family. Helen had approached the move with a great deal of trepidation. As a Holocaust survivor who had lost all her immediate family members yet managed to develop strong bonds of friendship and community in Montreal, she was fearful about what lay ahead.

These concerns, however, were soon put to rest. Her daughter directed her to the Bernard Betel Centre and for the past 10 years, Helen has been an active participant in many of the programs the centre provides.

She attends fitness classes three times a week and Shabbat services on Saturday morning. She enjoys the Fun with Yiddish meetings, the Tuesday morning lectures which cover a variety of topics, and the special events and trips that the centre sponsors -- such as the Mother's Day luncheon, the Canada Day celebration, day trips to have fun at Casino Rama, and see plays in Stratford and Orillia.

Helen acknowledges that she would not have done many of these things if she had not been a member of the centre. She is thankful to the centre staff for doing such a great job in organizing all these activities and being so helpful to her whenever she has any questions or concerns.

The centre has given her a new lease on life, providing the opportunity to meet new friends and gain exposure to new ideas and activities, making the move to Toronto a seamless transition to new surroundings and friends.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Knowing how much her mother benefits from the centre, Reggie Delovitch, is delighted that she was asked to join the Board of Directors in 2002-3. Any contributions she can make will be a way of saying thank you to the centre and its staff for everything they have done and continue to do to enrich her mother's daily life.

Reggie is a valuable addition to the centre's active, committed board. She has an MBA from York University and has been working in human resource management for the past 18 years. She has also volunteered in several not for profit organizations, offering human resources advice as needed.

In London, Ont., where she lived for several years, she became President of the Board of Directors of the London Association for Disabled Adults. She was also part of the team that interviewed Holocaust survivors for the Survivors of the Shoah Foundation, founded by Steven Spielberg, to use the videotaped accounts as a way to teach the horrors that racism can bring.

Hezbollah termed 'A-team of terrorists'

By URI ASH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top U.S. diplomat took aim at Hezbollah last week, saying the United States would go after the group he called "the A-team of terrorists."

"Hezbollah made the A-team of terrorists, maybe Al Qaeda is actually the B-team," Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage said in answer to a questions after a luncheon speech.

"We're going to go after them just like a high school wrestler goes after opponents. We're going to take them down one at a time," Armitage said.

Hezbollah is 'known or suspected to have been involved in numerous anti-U.S. terrorist attacks'

Like Al Qaeda, blamed for the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, Hezbollah is on the State Department's 2001 list of "designated foreign terrorist organizations."

Hezbollah is "known or suspected to have been involved in numerous anti-U.S. terrorist attacks, including the suicide truck bombings of the U.S. embassy in Beirut in April 1983 and the U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut in October 1983," according to the State Department.

Three Hezbollah members are on the FBI's list of 22 most wanted "terrorists" for the 1985 hijacking of TWA Flight 847, during which a U.S. Navy diver was killed, the State Department said in its 2001 report Patterns of Global Terrorism.

Hezbollah operates in southern Lebanon and the Bekaa Valley, and has established cells in Europe, Africa, South America, North America and Asia, the report said.

Hezbollah recently resumed firing at Israeli targets on the northern border, following a four-month lull. An Israeli soldier died Aug. 31 of wounds sustained the day before when the group's guerrillas fired about 80 anti-tank missiles at two Israeli outposts in Har Dov.

Last Thursday, Syria's official press lashed out at a proposed U.S. law that would punish Damascus for supporting Hezbollah and radical Palestinian groups, calling the idea the work of Israeli pawns in the U.S. Congress.

The remarks reflect rising tension in ties between Washington and Syria, which warns that the United States wants to fill the region with puppet states subordinated to Israel and that it could be a U.S. military target along with Iraq.

A draft law called the Syria Accountability Act before Congress threatens sanctions against Syria for backing Hezbollah and the Palestinian groups, which Washington deems "terrorist" but Syria defends as legitimate resistance to Israel.

"Extremist Congressmen known for their clear Zionist inclinations have proposed this law in full co-ordination with the racist government of [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon," Syria's Tishreen daily said in a commentary.

Washington has thanked Syria for co-operating against the Al Qaeda network, blamed for the Sept. 11 attacks on U.S. cities that sparked the anti-terror war, but warns Syria that its backing for militant groups contradicts that effort.

The paper said Lebanese Christians who sided with Israel during Lebanon's civil war and want Syria out of Lebanon were also behind the bill, which demands Syria end the "occupation" of Lebanon, where it has 20,000 troops and effective control.

"They are using some weak-willed individuals who conspire against Lebanon and its Arab identity, and collaborators with the Zionist entity for this purpose," it said, referring to pressure on the issue of "terrorism."

"Syria fought terrorism alone and with skill, and co-operated with the United States believing that terrorism threatens the region and the world, but sees the difference between terrorism and legitimate national resistance to occupation," it said.

Sutton Group Admiral's sales force grows by over 20 percent

If you've read this space before, you're familiar with the steady growth of Sutton Group Admiral Realty. "Steady" will now have to be replaced by "SPECTACULAR". In less than six months since Passover, the "little company that grew" has seen its sales force swell by more than 20%, to 120+ agents and counting!

Murray Goldkind

Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing top agents interested in joining their team.

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

"Fee for services" concept

Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Yiddish culture reigned supreme at Ashkenaz Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I wish they would start so I can leave," said an exasperated woman, fanning herself with an official Ashkenaz program as the late summer heat rose at the Lakeside Terrace.

Beyond the Pale, a klezmer band that combines East European folk styles with bluegrass and reggae, was clearly late, and tempers were flaring.

But once the musicians got started, belting out their infectious sounds, the woman calmed down and beamed with satisfaction.

On a bright, sunny Labour Day weekend, with temperatures climbing into the high 20s, the fourth Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture unfolded at Harbourfront.

A heady melange of music, dance, theatre, film and lectures, the festival attracted the young, the old, the middle-aged, the secular and the religious, cutting across barriers.

For three joyous days on the edge of Lake Ontario, Yiddish – mixed with English, Hebrew, a bit of Ladino and a babel of other languages – reigned supreme.

The mood of the festival seemed to be summed up by a sign nailed to a tree.

"Farshteit Yiddish?" a cartoon-like spaceman asked, standing on a planet that resembled the moon.

In truth, an understanding of Yiddish was not really necessary to appreciate the multifaceted wonders of Ashkenaz.

Amid the fragrance of barbecue chicken, tehina and fresh salad in the air, all you needed was a dollop of curiosity, an attachment to Jewish culture and the energy to take it all in.

If the heartfelt rhythms of klezmer animated you, you were in luck.

Ashkenaz was a showcase for the best and the brightest on the current scene, from Hungary's Di Naye Kapelye, which wafted in on the sounds of Transylvania, to Poland's Cracow Klezmer Band, which blended postmodern Jewish and Balkan melodies.

There was even a klezmer band for kids, Oy Vey!

And if you liked your music with a soulful, Ladino or Turkish touch, the Sons of Sepharad gave it to you in spades.

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir presented a tribute to Mordechai Gerbitig, the poet and songwriter who perished during the Holocaust.

Ashkenaz was a showcase for the best and brightest. [Jacob El-Baz photo]

And at the Studio Theatre, Mitch Smolkin, Ashkenaz's artistic director, put on a one-man show, The White Challah, adapted from Lamed Shapiro's Yiddish short story. The play, directed by Jennifer Capraru and turning on the history of pogroms, revolved around the bedraggled figure of a Russian peasant-soldier during World War I.

Camp Naivelt, an Ontario institution since the mid-1920s, was the subject of a photographic exhibit.

"I went to this camp," said a man in his late 30s, scanning nostalgic photos.

"Yeah," said his teenage daughter, trying to summon up a modicum of interest.

Sylwia Szymanska, a 26-year-old Polish scholar, delivered a lecture entitled Yiddish: Alive and Well in 21st Century Poland?

A Catholic who has taught at Warsaw University, she gave her talk in Yiddish, no less.

Anna Shternshis, a young scholar from Moscow who teaches at the University of Toronto, talked fervently about Yiddish folksongs in the Soviet Union in the 1930s.

Hal Niedzviecki, a Toronto writer, read from a story-in-progress set in Camp Gesher.

Movie fans, meanwhile, had their pick of The Last Klezmer, the story of a seasoned musician, and Jewish Luck, a classic Soviet silent film enlivened by the music of Anthony Coleman.

From the Yukon, of all places, dancer and choreographer Gail Lotenberg, a transplanted New Yorker who sought a deeper connection to nature, performed a piece based on a Passover seder.

Ashkenaz, in short, offered something for everybody. Bring it back.

Film is a terrific comedy

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Once in a while a special little film comes around that gives you a good, warm feeling all over. And sometimes, one of these films will have a "Jewish" connection.

This is the case of Kissing Jessica Stein, which is scheduled to be released on video on Sept. 17.

The story is rather simple and straightforward. Jessica Stein (played by Jennifer Westfeldt) is a sensitive but neurotic Jewish woman living and working in New York. Although successful in her professional life as a journalist, her personal life is a mess.

Everyone around her is getting married or having babies, while she can't even find a boyfriend. And the harder she tries, and the more dates she goes out on, the worse it gets.

One day she comes across an intriguing personal ad, except it is in the "women seeking women" section. She decides to take a chance and answers the ad. As a result, she

Former Bell Mobility girl takes her indy-film to Tinseltown

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

It's only been a year, but Toronto native Samantha Gutstadt has amassed enough professional credits to turn many other young actresses green with envy.

"It was amazing," said Gutstadt, 21, about her three-week trip to L.A. with co-producer Danielle Shamash. "I learned a lot about acting and producing."

The film is about three people on a road trip who are coming of age after high school. Along the way, they pick up a hitchhiker, and a love triangle involving Gutstadt's character ensues.

Gutstadt co-wrote, produced and stars as Carmen, the only female in the film.

The success of this film sums up a year of career of highlights for Gutstadt, whose eyes are an unusual mixture of green, grey and blue.

"I've been doing this since I was little, so I am seeing some of the rewards this year," she said at a coffee shop in Yorkville.

Gutstadt said she started modelling and acting when she was five, doing little fashion shows and some print work. At 14, she signed with her first agent, who placed her in some music videos and print ads.

Throughout high school she kept auditioning for roles and completed an internship at Citytv, but said it was difficult to get jobs.

"You have to have really thick skin. It's never a personal thing; sometimes it's just stupid things," she said.

After high school, Gutstadt entered the Ryerson film school and said she really enjoys the well-roundedness it affords her.

She wanted to catch on with a larger agency this past year. She was accepted by Characters Talent Agency after four auditions and a phone call from her former intern boss at MuchMusic, Bill Welychka, now a MuchMoreMusic producer.

Once she was represented by Characters, more opportunities came her way. She landed two nationally televised commercials, with Bell Mobility and Sprite. On the Sprite set, she got to work with the Toronto Raptors' Jerome Williams, whom she described as "so cool and very unspoiled."

She said that after the Bell commercial began airing, she was suddenly recognized by strangers, who she said would stop her and say, "Hey, it's the Bell Mobility girl!"

"It's weird seeing your work on TV," she said.

Gutstadt was also a guest star on Leap Years, an American show airing on Showtime in the United States and Bravo in Canada. In her episode, she played Amanda – a calculating, seductive student who has an affair with her teacher.

Her voice rose in excitement as she explained the thrill of having her own trailer on the set.

She also played Brenda, on an American movie series, The War Next Door.

But it hasn't always been successful, she said. She went to hundreds of auditions in the past year and didn't get one of the roles. "For every part I get, there are [many] rejections."

She says in her industry, confidence is important.

"Once you do one thing, your confidence just builds and producers see it."

Next fall, she will guest star on a new Comedy Network show called Puppets Who Kill, where – again – she plays a principal role as a bitchy, stuck-up girl.

"It's because I'm a brunette," she said, trying to explain why she seems to always get the same female role.

"I really just want to be the sweet girl next door," she added jokingly.

Recently Gutstadt entered the producing world, with her school friend and now business partner Shamash. The duo, which Gutstadt called a "power team," have opened up their own company called World Jungle Productions.

Samantha Gutstadt

They are currently working on several projects, but Gutstadt said, "Danielle and I want to have an empire. It is really hard to break in as a woman. We want to be a power team."

Gutstadt said she is very "stubborn. No, doesn't mean very much to me. I go for what I want.

"If I get one yes in 20 noes, it's worth it to me."

She wants to take this confidence to Los Angeles, where, she said, you are only one audition away from your career-breaking role.

After spending three weeks in Tinseltown this summer, she got a small taste of the strong Jewish connection that exists there. "The Canadian Jewish connection [in L.A.] is great. Everyone hangs out together. From Toronto, Montreal, from all over," she said, adding that every Jew has a connection to someone down there.

"Everything I want to do is there," she said

In the fall, Gutstadt will enter her final year at Ryerson. She wants to continue acting and producing, eventually "landing that one big role."

Powerful film captures a wrenching moment in time

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

La Derniere Lettre (The Last Letter), by Frederick Wiseman, is an altogether different kind of Holocaust film.

Scheduled to be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 12 and 13, Wiseman's austere black-and-white one-hour movie captures a wrenching moment in time.

Described as a work of "fictional cinema," La Derniere Lettre, in form at least, is more like theatre than film.

On a bare stage, Catherine Samie, the doyenne of the Paris-based Comedie-Francaise, performs a monologue adapted from Vassili Grossman's Russian novel, Life and Fate. The setting is a town in the Ukraine shortly after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941.

Contemplating her fate following the German occupation of her town, an elderly Jewish doctor pours out her heart in a letter to her beloved son, Vitya, who is somewhere far away. The woman, whose name goes unmentioned, has just been placed in a ghetto. These, surely, are her last days on earth.

Samie, her expressive face a map of conflicting emotions, is first seen as a silhouette on a gray screen. As the camera zooms in for a closeup, it reveals a person bereft of illusions.

The Germans, she observes forlornly, have disclosed their intentions. "Juden kaputt," they shouted in unison and with blood lust as they drove through the town.

She feels alone and forgotten, if only because her once kind and considerate Ukrainian neighbours have suddenly and without warning turned against her.

"You have no rights," they taunt, referring derogatively to Jews as Yids. "The air has been purified. It no longer smells of garlic."

And yet, as some of her neighbours argue over her worldly possessions on the eve of her transfer to the ghetto, they shed a tearful farewell. A former patient, normally a hard-hearted man, offers to carry her bags to the ghetto and to bring her a weekly ration of bread.

Clearly, the milk of human kindness flows amid these dark days.

The Germans impose draconian restrictions on the Jewish population, and issue a dire warning that Ukrainians will be shot if they are caught helping Jews.

As Samie casts long shadows, imparting a mood of menace, she tells of a neighbour who witnessed German soldiers or policemen shooting Jews in a field. Later, she hears that the Nazis have embarked on a systematic extermination campaign of Jews.

Catherine Samie in La Derniere Lettre:

Although the Germans are closing in on the ghetto, she feels a surprising sense of relief because others share her fate.

Yet, she confides to Vitya, conditions in the ghetto are miserable and growing still worse. And then, in anguished tones, she speaks of a Jewish traitor in their midst.

An assimilated Jew bound to Russian culture, the doctor admits she never felt Jewish. But now, in her hour of duress, she evinces a maternal tenderness toward, and admiration for, her fellow Jews.

Despite the crushing weight of oppression the Jews bear, there is hope in the air, albeit misplaced. There are rumors they will be traded for German prisoners of war.

And, as always, life goes on amid the deprivation and the suffering. There has been a wedding, and a maternity ward has been established in a clinic.

Above all, she reports, the will to survive is strong and unremitting.

Nevertheless, she has considered suicide. And at night, panic overtakes her.

In moments of calm, she thinks of Vitya and dreams of her mother. But ultimately, reality sets in with a thud. The Germans have just smashed an old man's skull, and the children of the ghetto, sensing their days are numbered, look ever so serious.

With her deportation drawing near, she reiterates her undying love for Vitya.

To its credit, La Derniere Lettre, a stark and powerful film, never strikes a false note. And Samie is simply terrific.

A terrific comedy

meets a fascinating woman, Helen Cooper, (played by Heather Juergensen) and they click almost instantly. Slowly, Jessica and her new found friend begin a relationship and the results are funny and very poignant.

Add to all this a Jewish family that adores Jessica, but also has high expectations, and we have the basis of a terrific comedy with some curves and surprises in the story line.

This film was originally conceived as an off-Broadway show, which eventually evolved into an independent film. Jennifer Westfeldt and Heather Juergensen are the stars and the writers of Kissing Jessica Stein.

Their lively, personable performances bring these characters to life and give the film the charm and humour which allows this film to stand out from the scores of independent films produced each year.

Scott Cohen, Tovah Feldshuh and Jackie Hoffman are also featured and Tovah Feldshuh's performance is one of her best in years.

Kissing Jessica Stein is a film that leaves the audience wanting to see it again. This is now possible with its home video release on the Twentieth Century Fox label, which should mean that it will be easily available everywhere.

Quotable Quote: When Barbra Streisand produced, directed and starred in the movie Yentl (1983), Isaac Bashevis Singer, author of the short story on which the movie was based, was far from pleased.

In a famous self-interview in the New York Times in which he vented his dissatisfaction, Singer explained that he was unhappy, first of all, because Streisand had attained an uncommon "bargain" when she had purchased rights to the story years before.

More significantly, the master storyteller said he was annoyed because Streisand had turned the film into a musical, had failed to understand Yentl's passion for learning, and had given her a gratuitous journey to the United States.

"Was going to America Miss Streisand's idea of a happy ending for Yentl?" he asked, with a flourish of the wry (some would even say caustic) wit he apparently possessed in abundance.

"What would Yentl have done in America? Worked in a sweatshop 12 hours a day where there is no time for learning? Would she try to marry a salesman in New York, move to the Bronx or to Brooklyn and rent an apartment with an ice box and a dumbwaiter?"

Somewhat comically, Singer then suggested how Hollywood might treat other books. Would Madame Bovary end up on the Riviera? Would Anna Karenina marry an American millionaire, Would Raskolnikov become a Wall Street banker?

Dr. Fleischman now a smuggler

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Kevin Hunter is a lot like most of us. He struggles at work, juggles money problems and tries to spend time with his family. He also happens to be a drug smuggler.

Rob Morrow plays Hunter in the TV series Street Time, about a parolee just released from a five-year prison term for trafficking $1 million worth of marijuana. He is trying to distance himself from the elements that led him to jail but winds up taking over his drug-dealing brother's nightclub.

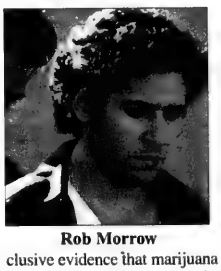
"I really like him," Morrow says of his alter ego. "He's an interesting character for the times in a post-modern sense of moral ambiguity. From what I can gather, everything about him is all positive. He's into his family. He'd put his life on the line for them. He's got rectitude about his life. It just so happens that he smuggles pot."

The 39-year-old New York actor is best known for his role as Joel Fleischman, the New York fish-out-of-water Jewish doctor in Alaska on the hit series Northern Exposure, which ran from 1990 to '94.

"I liked playing a Jewish character," Morrow said in an interview. "There was a part of me that wanted them to make Kevin Hunter Jewish. Then it seemed not appropriate because he's clearly not Jewish. My wife in the show is Jewish, which I like."

In addition to his role in Northern Exposure, Morrow also played a Jewish character, Richard Goodwin, in the movie Quiz Show (1994). In fact, many of Street Time's characters are Jewish: the show's chief of police, Hunter's wife and a fellow felon, played by Red Buttons.

Morrow is getting some exposure to the north once again, filming the new series in Toronto. "I love it here. It definitely is cleaner than New York."



Rob Morrow

But how does an actor mentally switch gears from playing a character who prescribes drugs to one who traffics them?

"The distinction is you always have to try to find a way to empathize with your character. The way the people in the 'hippie Mafia' are distancing themselves from the rest of the drug culture is by saying that there is no conclusive evidence that marijuana is any worse than, say, alcohol or cigarettes. They feel they're on a moral high ground, that they won't get caught in any of the 'karma" that comes with dealing with hard drugs. For me, then, he'd say, 'Maybe it's illegal, but it's not wrong.'"

In the real world, Morrow also remains optimistic despite 9/11 and the crisis in the Middle East.

"What gave me hope was when Russia joined NATO. I said if that could happen, they can figure it out over there [in Israel]." Morrow, who directed the film Maze and an episode of HBO's Oz will be directing future episodes of Street Time.

"Acting and directing are completely antithetical in their disciplines.

"As I get older, there's something that feels more mature about directing. Maybe it's the responsibility involved. If acting is a cultivation of narcissism, directing is about looking at the world and trying to reflect it. Instead of being a colour on the canvas, you're painting the entire canvas.

"Then again, acting is so much fun. It's so cathartic. I'll do it as long as they'll let me do it."

Street Time currently only runs on US channel Showtime.

Israel seeking help from MDs in Diaspora

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

In its preparations for a worst-case scenario, Israel is asking doctors from abroad to rush there in the event of a war or mass-casualty attack. Israel has not called upon the assistance of foreign doctors since the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Three Canadians were among a group of 22 North American and South African Jewish doctors who took part in a week-long study tour last month of Israel's military and civilian emergency facilities, organized by the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) Medical Corps.

"The IDF is preparing for two scenarios where outside help might be needed, both of which are very frightening and everyone hopes will never happen," said Rhoda Kagan, a pediatric allergist who was among the group.

"The first is a true war, in which lots of physicians, interns and residents would be called up for reserve duty, which would leave the hospital short.

"The other is a non-conventional attack, such as biological or chemical warfare, where there would be mass casualties, and the Israeli facilities would run out of hands."

The other Canadians were Kagan's colleague at the Montreal Children's Hospital, Barry Love, a cardiologist, and Brian Klar, a family physician from Toronto with experience in emergency medicine. The rest of the group, except for a South African, were American.

In its report of the trip, the Global Jewish Agenda, the Jewish Agency's newsletter, wrote, "Many Jewish doctors around the world have expressed interest in volunteering for Israel during this time of continuing terror attacks.

"This solidarity mission focused on learning about the co-operation between the civilian and military services during an emergency and in creating a co-operative network between medical professionals in Israel and the rest of the world."

Israel is looking to establish a roster of doctors available to come to Israel on short notice and serve as volunteers. Ideally, their numbers would be great enough to allow them to rotate quickly – perhaps for periods of two to four weeks – so they would not be away from their own practices for too long.

The Israelis asked the doctors on the trip if they would be interested, in the interim, in returning to work at an assigned hospital for a two-week stint each year or, perhaps, every six months, Kagan said.

They visited the IDF central command and homefront command medical branches, the IDF School of Military Medicine at Tsrifin, the Hadassah Medical Centre's burn and trauma care units, the Tel Hashomer Sheba Medical Centre and the Magen David Adom overseas volunteers program. They also met with Health Minister Nissim Dahan and senior staff at the health ministry.

They watched emergency medical exercises and learned about the defences Israel has in place in the event of biological or chemical warfare, including measures that would enable hospitals to set themselves up in temporary premises.

Kagan, 38, said she went on rounds in the hospitals' pediatric wards, getting a sense of whether she could on short notice "jump in and do general pediatrics."

Many logistics need to be worked out, such as issues regarding licensing, malpractice and medication names, Kagan said. Another problem is language: could she practise without being fluent in Hebrew?

Moreover, she said, Israel can only prepare itself for so much.

"Nobody knows what to expect exactly. There are a lot of unknowns. That's the scary part."

Kagan said she heard different opinions on the situation from IDF and civilian doctors.

Despite the sketchy details, Kagan said she is interested in volunteering. She added that she is spreading the word among her colleagues.

HU student creates breakthrough AIDS treatment test

JERUSALEM — Hebrew University researchers have developed a test to identify at an early stage whether AIDS patients are developing a tolerance to their medication, and if so, which other drug could help and what dosage should be taken.

AIDS patients who take medication to suppress the disease and reduce its severe symptoms can develop a tolerance for the drugs, forcing doctors to move them to other medication, usually involving lengthy tests before the proper dosage can be determined.

PhD candidate Lital Alfonte, who developed the test as part of her thesis project, says the main problem with the AIDS virus is the speed with which it changes, enabling it to quickly develop an immunity to medications.

Alfonte recently received the Kay Prize today, Hebrew U's award to researchers who develop new applications for their science with commercial potential. Chemistry professor Itamar Wilner was her adviser together with virologist Prof. Moshe Kotler.

Alfonte says current procedures have the doctors systematically monitoring the level of the AIDs virus in the blood and when it increases, they change medications for the patient. But sometimes, she says, it is difficult to tell which of the drugs in the "cocktail" of drugs is the one creating the problem.

The research team has yet to publish its findings in the professional literature, so independent verification of the new procedure have not been conducted. According to Alfonte, their tests on 15 patients have all proved the credibility of the system.

Toronto wins 'gold medal' for most medals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's teenage athletes turned in a golden performance at the recently concluded JCC Maccabi Games in Montreal, winning the "gold medal" for most medals.

Toronto's 90-person team brought home 60 medals – 22 of them gold – to lead all participants. Coming next were the host Montrealers, who registered 51 top three performances while New York City's 92nd Street Y was third with 44 medals.

Toronto's swimming team was particularly effective, earning 16 gold medals, 15 silvers and 12 bronze. The 11-person team consists of experienced swimmers who train at a variety of Metro-area clubs. Many of them are likely to continue their careers at U.S. colleges on partial scholarships, said Grant Smith, head of the Toronto delegation.

The boys' six-man golf team also boasted an impressive medal haul, capturing five golds, one silver and three bronze in a variety of scoring formats, including stroke play and best ball.

The tennis team earned four medals, including two silvers and one each in gold and bronze.

The girls basketball team came home with a silver medal after losing the title game to a team from New York, while the girls softball squad also came in second, losing the championship game to a club from Los Angeles.

In soccer, the girls team won bronze, quite an accomplishment for a team that was making its first appearance at the youth games since 1986, Smith said.

In other events, the boys baseball team lost a title game to a team from Los Angeles while the boys basketball team finished out of the medals.

The boys soccer team also failed to earn a medal. Soccer players donned black armbands in memory of Greg Savenko, a former defender/midfielder who was killed while tubing in Chandos Lake near Peterborough, Ont.

Savenko, who was 17 when he died, played on the 16 and under team in Philadelphia that won a bronze medal last summer. The year before, he was on the Toronto team that competed in Staten Island.

Last year, he served as co-captain of the 16 and under Canadian Maccabiah soccer team in Israel, which finished fourth.

When they weren't competing against young athletes from across North America, the Toronto athletes took part in a "day of caring," a program aimed at giving youngsters a taste of community service. It included visits to seniors homes, working with special needs children and preparing packages for Israel, Smith said.

The young athletes also enjoyed a video-linked shmoozefest with high schoolers in Israel.

Altogether, an estimated 1,600 athletes between the ages of 13 and 16 took part in the Montreal games. Junior Maccabi events were also hosted in Memphis, Tenn., Omaha, Neb., Baltimore, Md., and Springfield, Mass. involving about 7,000 youngsters.

The opening ceremonies were held in Molson Centre, home of the Montreal Canadiens, while the closing event was held at Centre Claude Robillard, an Olympic water polo venue and stadium.

New gym class geared for toddlers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

From the "it's never too early" school of thought, here are a few examples of precocious over-achievers.

Tiger Woods started golfing when he was around three – he scored his first birdie when he was six; when Wayne Gretzky was six, he was playing organized hockey with older boys and using his playmates as pylons on the ice.

Great athletes often start young but by Sima Studin's standards, Woods and Gretzky were grizzled old veterans when they registered their first sporting successes.

Studin is president and manager of Toronto Aspirals, a rhythmic gymnastics centre with a 20-year pedigree. On Sept. 30, Toronto Aspirals in conjunction with the Bathurst JCC will introduce a new program of "Kindergym" sessions, geared for toddlers from 18 months of age to kids six years old.

The youngsters, accompanied by a parent or grandparent, will be exposed to colourful foam shapes like barrels, boxes, cubes, umbrellas and mats that they will climb over and crawl under.

Working with the foamies will offer them a variety of learning possibilities, Studin explains.

Instructors can create obstacle courses for the kids to traverse with the idea that the children will explore the forms, climb mini-walls, cross a foot-high balance beam, and not be afraid, Studin said.

"We believe the sooner they're involved in the fitness and gym environment, the more comfortable they'll be when they go to school."

Studin, who usually trains girls who are in their early teens, believes children today have such a comfortable, undemanding lifestyle, they "slip away from fitness activities. We try to eliminate these obstacles at the beginning."

Introducing children to a kid-friendly gym environment advances their physical, emotional and social development, Studin contends. By the time they hit the ripe old age of three or four, they've increased their balance and co-ordination and "they're ready for any sport."

At around age three, Kindgergym kids are divided into a separate group for more advanced activities.

Twice per session, theme days will be introduced (such as Teddy Bear time) and at other times, bubbies and zaydies will be invited to watch the kids perform.

Sessions will be held once or twice a week for 10 weeks at the Bathurst JCC. Cost of the session is $90 plus an annual registration fee of $10. For more information or to register, call 905-760-0092 or 416-242-6354 or visit www.aspirals.ca.

Dear Karilani,

This fall, I am attending university in my hometown while my best friend is going to a school that is a two-hour drive from where we live. She has been looking forward to going, and I am happy she is so excited, but I am worried that once she leaves she will forget about me. We have grown up together and I can't imagine life without her. What should I do?

Left at Home

About Teens

Dear Left at Home,

It is normal to feel insecure about your friend leaving. She is going through a big change and it will be difficult for you to adjust to her not always being around.

Instead of worrying about the lack of time you will have together, focus on making plans for the time you do have. Set aside a few days before she leaves for the two of you to do all things that you enjoy doing together. Eat one last meal in your favourite restaurant and see a movie in the theatre you went to every weekend.

You should also make long-term plans. Book a vacation together for the winter holidays. This will give you something to look forward to and will ensure that you keep in touch. Communicate with each other by phone and e-mail.

As well, you need to remember that you are also going to experience some changes. You may not be leaving home, but you will still be meeting many people. Create study groups with your classmates and join some of the clubs your new school has to offer. Don't rush home when your classes let out – instead, spend some time on campus so you can meet as many people as possible.

Don't look at your friend leaving as something negative. Rather, view it as a step forward in your life. The next time the two of you see each other, you will both have many stories to trade and advice to share. Going to different schools does not have to be the end of your friendship. The distance will only affect your relationship if you let it.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

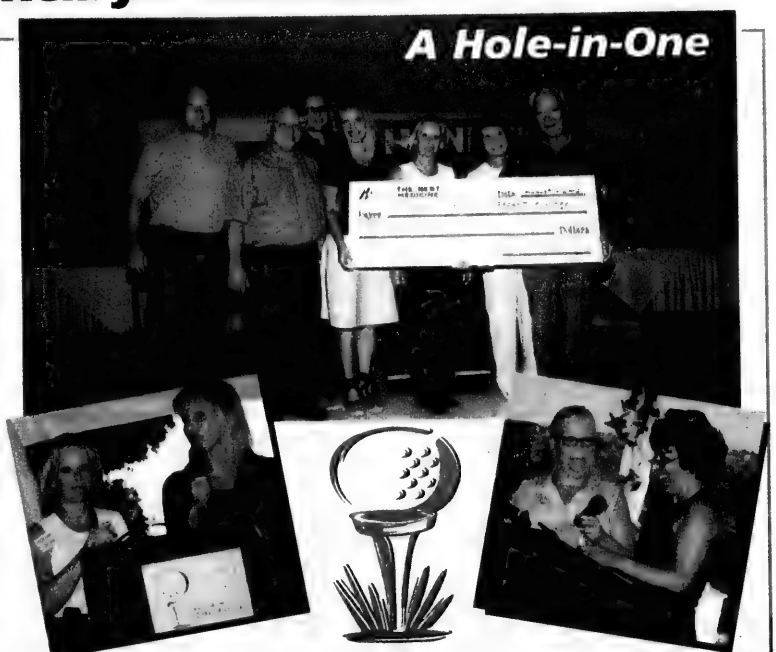
YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Henry's Tournament fore Health



The 6th annual Henry's Tournament fore Health in support of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital, was held on Monday, August 12, 2002 at the Board of Trade Country Club. It was another Sold Out event, raising close to $175,000 for the Breast Centre. Over 300 women showed up on this beautiful sunny day to play golf, shop at the silent and live auctions, enjoy the Iceberg Vodka martini bar, and walk away with great gifts including a new pair of golf shoes and new club head covers.

To top off the wonderful day, Karen Garscadden hit a hole-in-one – the first in tournament history! Many thanks to our generous sponsors who helped make this day memorable, especially Title Sponsor, Henry's Camera and Presenting Sponsor, Scotiabank. Other major sponsors included IBM, Royal de Versailles, Air Canada, CFMT, Canadian Spirit, and Audi. A special thank you to Sam Winberg. Without our sponsors, donors and players we would not have been able to reach our 6 year total of over $750,000.

September 11th Remembered

The world is a different place since last September. One of the changes is with regards to our preparedness for bioterrorism. The successful dissemination of anthrax spores through the mail demonstrated to all just how unprepared we were for a bioterrorist attack. Since then, much has been accomplished to allow us to better deal with such a threat; decisions have been made with regards to the purchase of additional smallpox vaccine, the allocation of new monies for training and equipping first responders, research, and upgrading laboratory facilities across Canada to be able to process biological specimens. As part of that preparedness, Dr. Donald E. Low, Chief of the Department of Microbiology at Mount Sinai Hospital, has been appointed by the Federal Government to Chair of the National Advisory Committee on Chemical, Biological, Radio-Nuclear Safety, Security, and Research. The mandate of this committee is to provide expert advice to the Minister of Health and Health Canada on what elements to consider, prepare for, and respond to, should a bioterrorism event occur in Canada.

On an anniversary that stirs emotions of loss, we urge you to remember the generosity and compassion that have been expressed over the last year and join us in extending heartfelt condolences to those who experienced loss and pain.

'Fight regimes sponsoring terror'

Former Israeli PM gives defiant speech in Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Benjamin Netanyahu capped a tumultuous speaking tour of four Canadian cities last week by calling for the overthrow of Arab regimes that sponsor terrorism.

"The way to fight terrorism is to fight the regimes sponsoring it," the former Israeli prime minister said in a speech at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, given under the auspices of State of Israel Bonds.

Netanyahu, whose Likud government lasted from 1996 until 1999, said the Palestinian Authority (PA), led by Yasser Arafat, is a terrorist entity that must be eradicated.

Describing the PA as "Arafatstan," Netanyahu declared that Arafat, his former negotiating partner under the Olso accords, would have "to go down." Introduced as "prime minister," Netanyahu lumped the PA with the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, which was ousted last year, and with Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq, which the United States seeks to dismantle.

Claiming that the root cause of terrorism is totalitarianism, Netanyahu said that terrorism can only be challenged if the dictatorships that nurture it are replaced with democratic governments.

"We're in a great battle," he told an audience running into the hundreds. "Terrorism has to be fought and vanquished."

Netanyahu, who was Israel's ninth and youngest prime minister, arrived in Toronto after stops in Winnipeg, Montreal and Ottawa.

He was scheduled to speak to the U.S. Congress about terrorism on Sept. 12, a day after the first anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.

His engagements in Canada were arranged by Israel Bonds, the Asper Foundation and Hebrew University.

Netanyahu's tour was dogged by anti-Israel demonstrations.

CANADA

Menorah Appeal

TORONTO — Chosen People Ministries is appealing a Federal Court of Canada ruling barring it from using a menorah as a legally protected logo. In May, the court ruled the missionary group was not entitled to register a stylized menorah as an official mark, in part because the symbol is so closely associated with the Jewish people.

ISRAEL

Citizenship Revoked

JERUSALEM — Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai has revoked the citizenship of Nahad Abu Kishaq, an Israeli Arab who is in prison facing charges of helping Hamas carry out terrorist attacks. Unlike two other Israeli Arabs whom Yishai wants to strip of their citizenship, Kishaq did not take steps to appeal the decision within the 30-day period granted by Yishai.

Saddam Spoke to Bibi

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein secretly communicated with him in 1998 to say Iraq would not launch a missile attack on Israel. Netanyahu said it was thought at the time that Saddam might launch a missile attack, as he had done during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, because of tensions over UN weapons inspections. "I sent him a message and told him that this was a very wise decision on his part [not to attack]," Netanyahu said.

Boy Recruited

JERUSALEM — A Fatah cell in Nablus recruited a 15-year-old boy to carry out a suicide attack in Israel, according to Israeli officials. The boy's relatives were informed of the plot by Israel's Shin Bet domestic security service, the Associated Press reported.

Army Probes Deaths

JERUSALEM — An Israeli army committee said soldiers followed proper procedures in recent incidents in which 13 Palestinian civilians were killed by Israeli military fire. The three separate incidents took place near the Gaza settlement of Netzarim, the West Bank town of Tubas and the West Bank city of Hebron. The committee submitted its findings Sept. 6.

WORLD

Leave, Israelis Told

RIO DE JANEIRO — The leading candidate to become Brazil's next vice-president says Israelis should leave the Middle East. Interviewed by a Jewish journalist last week about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Senator Jose Alencar said, "There is only one exit: Israel must buy territory somewhere else. Otherwise there will be an everlasting problem in that area. The United States could help." Jewish observers were saddened that the two leading candidates for the presidency – who are both affiliated with Alencar's Workers party – did not distance themselves from Alencar's comments.

Envoy Sent to Algeria

PARIS — The former French ambassador to Britain, who last year used an expletive to describe Israel, reportedly has been reassigned to Algeria. Daniel Bernard was recalled from his posting in London last month. He achieved notoriety late last year when he referred to Israel as "that shitty little country" at a London luncheon.

Owner Convicted

BERLIN — A German club owner was convicted Sept. 4 of inciting hatred and anti-Semitism. Rudolf Fischer, who was sentenced to six months' probation, went on trial for cancelling a Jewish charity event in Munich that was to have featured the granddaughter of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. The event, to raise money for Keren Hayesod, was to have included Noa Ben-Artzi, but Fischer said at the time he didn't want to host political events.

Reward Offered

BERLIN — Germany is offering a $10,000 (US) reward for clues leading to the arrest of vandals who desecrated a Holocaust memorial near Berlin. On Sept. 5, vandals firebombed a museum commemorating the April 1945 death march of 45,000 concentration camp inmates deeper into Germany as the Soviet armies approached at the end of World War II. They also scrawled a swastika and SS symbols outside the museum at Belower Wald near Berlin. Officials described the incident as the worst anti-Semitic attack on a Holocaust memorial in a decade.

Legislator Ousted

ATLANTA — The father of a well-known anti-Israel U.S. congresswoman has lost his own re-election bid. Just three weeks after Representative Cynthia McKinney, a Democrat from Georgia, was upset, Billy McKinney lost his chance to keep his seat as a Georgia state representative to John Noel. The Atlanta Jewish community, which had been angered by the elder McKinney's anti-Semitic remarks, supported Noel. Before his daughter lost her congressional race last month, McKinney spelled out the reason for his daughter's tough fight: "J-E-W-S," he said in a television interview.

PA Mocks U.S. on Sept. 11 Anniversary

JERUSALEM— The official daily newspaper of the Palestinian Authority (PA) ran two cartoons ridiculing the United States on the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, according to Palestinian Media Watch.

One cartoon appearing in Al-Hayat Al-Jadida depicted Uncle Sam running away from the words "Sept. 11." The second showed the World Trade Center towers standing over a mass of dead bodies that are described as the victims of American imperialism.

The PA had ordered its security forces to prevent any form of celebration marking the Sept. 11 attacks, the Jerusalem Post reported last week.

Meanwhile, Israeli President Moshe Katsav conveyed a message of support and condolence to the United States on Sept. 11. In a message to U.S. President George W. Bush, Katsav also said that for the past decade, the world had ignored warning signs of such attacks.

Various events were held in Israel to commemorate the anniversary of the attacks, including a performance of Mozart's Requiem, one of many memorial concerts held around the world.

PM names new ambassador to Great Britain

First Jewish high commissioner to London

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mel Cappe, a former clerk of the Canadian Privy Council, secretary to the cabinet and head of the public service, has been appointed Canada's ambassador to Britain and Northern Ireland.

"I am the first Jewish high commissioner to London as far as I know," he said in an interview on the eve of the High Holy Days.

"I'm not sure whether Donald MacDonald, Roy McMurtry, Fred Eaton or Roy McLaren were Jewish," he added, displaying a touch of wry humour. He was referring to his predecessors in Britain.

Cappe, who was Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's special advisor until May, is 53.

He was born and educated in Toronto, the son of Dave and Patty Cappe, whom he described as his "guiding lights."

An economist who graduated from the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario, Cappe joined the civil service in 1975.

He and his wife, Marni – an urban planner who left her job with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities to accompany her husband – arrived in London on Aug. 17.

"Her majesty, the queen, will be having us over for tea shortly," he said.

This is Cappe's first posting as a diplomat.

"I'm very pleased and excited to have been given the opportunity to represent my country abroad. My 27 years of experience as an economist and senior government official prepared me well for this job," he said.

His first priorities will be to promote British investment in Canada and to facilitate trade with Britain.

"Government-to-government relations start off deep and strong and I want to continue to maintain that," he noted.

"I also want to change British preconceptions of Canada by advancing Canadian culture."

Cappe, who had aspired to be an academic, joined the civil service with the intention of staying a year while he finished his PhD thesis.

"I found, instead, that the issues I worked on were fascinating and the people I worked with, contrary to the preconceptions and prejudices I had, were intellectually stimulating and personally challenging. So I never did finish my PhD."

During his years in Ottawa, Cappe held several senior economic and policy positions.

He was deputy secretary to the Treasury Board and deputy minister of the environment.

In addition, Cappe was deputy minister of human resources development, deputy minister of labour and chair of the Employment Insurance Commissioin.

As Privy Council clerk, he was Canada's top civil servant.

He held the position for three and a half years, during which time he dealt with the Y2K phenomenon, the war in Kosovo, the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Afghanistan.

Cappe's father was a pharmacist before he retired. He refers to his mother as "E-bubby, because of her obsession with e-mail."

Mel Cappe

His brother, Lorne, an architect and urban designer, works for the city of Toronto.

"He has taught me a tremendous amount about life and what's important in it."

It was like a movie set

From the editor's desk

Last week, I and approximately 1,000 others attended the speech that former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu delivered at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on behalf of Israel Bonds.

On arriving at the theatre, what struck the senses first was the level of the din and the noise. Two crowds of people, separated by a driveway not more than 20 feet wide, shouted at each other, taunted each other and hurled slogans and occasionally epithets at each other.

The deeply contrasting colours of the two opposing sides struck the senses as well.

The larger group, the 250 or so anti-Israel, anti-Netanyahu's-right-to-speak protesters, was festooned primarily in red, white, green and black, the colours of the Palestinian movement, the massive concentration of which evoked sensations of earthiness, compactness, dark, brooding.

The smaller group of the 150 or so pro-Israel, pro-Netanyahu's-right-to-speak demonstrators, was covered in blue and white, which engendered, as the colours were always intended to, breezy, ethereal sensations.

Of course, I was undoubtedly projecting pre-conditioned associations upon the weaving, waving tableau of flags and colours. But it was indisputable in my mind, nevertheless, that the weight of the highly contrasting colours evoked equally contrasting, very different emotional gravities.

Even before my senses had adjusted to the raucous sounds and sights, it was quickly apparent that it was not the narrow curbed driveway that kept the two haranguing hordes apart. Rather, it was the metal barricades on each side of the driveway and, of course, the police.

Up close, observed at street level, from underneath their massive chests, eight large horses standing side by side – their uniformed, well-equipped police riders sitting very tall in their respective saddles – create an imposing impression of strength.

When one adds to the eight horses at least 100 riot-ready police officers in operational formation, the impression of strength burgeons into an unambiguous demonstration of power and resolve.

It was like a scene from the movies.

But, of course, it was not.

No one was acting.

There were, however, cameras, lots of them: television cameras, video cameras, digital cameras, single lens reflex cameras and a number of disposable ones too.

The certainty that there would be so many cameras was, of course, one of the main reasons that there were anti-Israel protesters near the entrance to the theatre.

The images of their protest, beamed to points far and wide around the globe, were strategically more important than the fact of their protest. The protest, in and of itself, achieved nothing.

And because there would be no violence in Toronto as there had been the previous day in Montreal, the accolades for the protesters from their anti-Israel, anti-democracy kindred souls would derive from the televised proof of their "courage" in shouting at, and staring down, a huge rabble of more than 1,000 (including the hard-core supporters of Israel inside the theatre) oppressive Zionists.

Amid the anti-Israel protesters, there were a plethora of banners, flags and signs, each imparting its timeless message. It was sad, but not surprising, to see two banners purported to be borne by Jewish youth for peace and Jewish women against the occupation. But the only flags amid the anti-Israel protesters that really angered were the ones emblazoned with the emblem of CUPE Ontario.

It is offensive – morally and politically – that this union, which includes some of the teaching staff at our universities, would join a campaign whose purpose, at its core, is to vilify, incriminate and delegitimize Israel, to see the Jewish State eliminated.

The presence among the anti-Israel forces of the union that represents some of their teachers made it so heartening to see that the majority of the pro-Israel forces were students. They showed commitment, determination and even courage to be on the other side of the "barricade."

I spoke with two of the student demonstrators: Paul Cooper and Miriam Levin. They are members of the Young Zionist Partnership at York University.

When they were told that the International Socialists were distributing pamphlets urging individuals to show anti-Israel solidarity, when they were told that a number of activists from the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights were headed to Toronto from Montreal, Cooper and Levin decided to take their place on the side of the driveway defending Israel.

"We came to help ensure that Benjamin Netanyahu would be able to speak," Cooper said.

"We came to show our support," Levin added.

The scene outside the theatre was a shock to the senses; it boiled the blood and stirred the emotions.

It was, however, a fitting prelude to the searing message concerning truth and terrorism that would later be delivered inside by Israel's former prime minister.

A number of bemused readers called last week to point out the incongruous and confusing sub-headline "U.S., Israel agree" that appeared under the main headline "Libya wants nuclear weapons" on page 1. It seemed clear to us at the time. But I agree with those readers: we should have been more judicious in our choice of words.

Victims of 9/11 honoured at service

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canada is safer now than it was one year ago, but we have no way of knowing how safe we really are, said MP Art Eggleton, at a Sept. 11 memorial service.

"Terrorists nowadays do not launch military actions against other militaries, they go after weaknesses in the system.

"As we strengthen those weaknesses, they will look for other weaknesses," Eggleton said at the service sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada.

Terrorism has now become an everyday part of our vocabulary, he said, but it is nothing new in other parts of the world.

"While we stand shoulder to shoulder with the United States, we must also stand shoulder to shoulder with Israel.

"With its own forces, Israel is trying to protect its people. We must give it moral support and make sure innocent civilians are protected from people who threaten their lives," Eggleton said.

The campaign against terrorism will not be won on the basis of military operations, he said. "We have to find ways to deter terrorists. We have to find ways to cut off their money, but that has not happened. They are still collecting funds.

"We must also stop them from capturing the hearts and minds of their young people."

Jason Kenney, a Calgary MP and a member of the Canadian Alliance party, said that on Sept. 11 last year, "we all learned what it is like to face hatred combined with the force of violence.

"It is an experience that the Jewish people have suffered far too often," he said.

We must remember that those who unleashed their violence on the United States one year ago, are the same people who have killed innocent civilians in Israel, said Kenney.

"We as Canadians who support democracy, justice and freedom, have to stand by the victims of terrorism and violence on Sept. 11, and every week in Israel.

"It is important for us to realize the magnitude of terrorism in other parts of the world. We have to think of the impact it has on Israeli society," said Kenney.

The evening, which began with the singing of the Canadian and American national anthems, included a candle-lighting ceremony, and poetry reading by CHAT students Jamie Filer, Rebecca Roher and Deborah Cole.

K'el Maleh Rachamim was sung by Rudy Bromberg. The service ended with the sounding of the shofar.

NEW ADDRESS

Demonstrators rally outside Netanyahu event

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's supporters welcomed Benjamin Netanyahu to the Toronto Centre for the Arts last week.

But outside, pro-Palestinian protesters shouting "Shame, shame" and "End the occupation" branded the former Israeli prime minister a war criminal.

Carrying Israeli and Palestinian flags and waving placards, the two sides were kept apart by barricades and armed police officers.

Violence did not flare, but the atmosphere was tense as Jews and Palestinians booed each other in the hour or so before Netanyahu delivered his speech.

Pro-Israel (left) and pro-Palestinian (right) demonstrators held separate rallies outside the Toronto Centre for the Arts last week. [Stephen Epstein/Big Dipper Communications]

The messages on the signs and placards on the Jewish side were blunt and to the point, including:

- "Israel, We Support You;"
- "Stop Supporting Terrorism;"
- "Uproot Arafat's Kingdom of Terror;" and
- "Palestinianism is Nazism;"

The Palestinians and their supporters were just as emphatic.

They chanted, "Bibi, you're not welcome here, take this message loud and clear," and "Long live Palestine."

An Arab woman, wheeling an infant in a carriage, held up a sign: "Zionism is Racism." A man carried a sign: "Right of Return is Sacred."

Meanwhile, a non-Arab man shouted, "Israel-U.S., how many kids did you kill today?"

Close by, supporters of the Palestinians bellowed, "Go back to Russia, Go Back to Europe."

On a black lamp post, a sticker read: "Holocaust victims created once more."

As this reporter waded into the pro-Palestinian crowd after talking to a woman on the Jewish side of the divide, a beefy Palestinian man asked, "Are you Jewish?"

"Yes."

"Shanah Tovah. Welcome," the man replied.

Bookstore to keep selling pro-Palestinian buttons

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A local doctor says he has purchased his last book from the Toronto Women's Bookstore.

Dr. Ari Zaretsky, the head of the cognitive behaviour therapy clinic at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre and an assistant professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, says on a recent visit to the Harbord Street store, he was enraged to find pro-Palestinian buttons on display at the front counter.

The buttons – for sale in a separate display from other buttons – are arranged under a sign that reads "End the Occupation Buttons $2."

There are several buttons, some of which say "Free Palestine – Time for Peace Time for Women;" "End the Occupation Now;" and "Palestine – Homeland Denied."

"The framing is in feminist language, but when we read between the lines, the mindset is that Israel oppresses the Palestinians," Zaretsky said.

"They told me they believe in working towards peace and that they do not support terrorism, but they also say that Israel should leave the territories.

"The store does not sell buttons condemning suicide bombers. They are not taking an active stance against [them]."

Esther Vise, a board member of the bookstore said that they have no specific buttons that call for the end of suicide bombing "because we believe that the statement of 'end the occupation' encompasses this view. We believe that suicide bombing in Israel is a direct response to the larger issue of the ongoing state oppression and subjugation of Palestinians and to the occupation of Palestinian territories."

Anjula Gogia, co-manager of the store refused to talk about the issue but did provide The CJN with a written statement.

"We continue to carry the buttons, as they are consistent with our mandate," the statement reads.

That mandate includes "working in an anti-oppression framework that supports liberation struggles, anti-racist movements, struggles against anti-Semitism, and human rights work" and "carrying books and materials that deal with issues of feminism, racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, anti-Semitism, ableism, classism and ageism," the statement says.

The mandate also includes a "commitment to social justice and activism" and "carrying books by and about first nations women, women of colour, Jewish women, lesbian/bisexual women and trans people."

Regarding the Middle East crisis, the statement continues, "we work with individuals and groups within Jewish, Palestinian and social activist communities, such as Women Against the Occupation, Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation, Creative Response, and the Coalition for a Just Peace in Israel and Palestine.

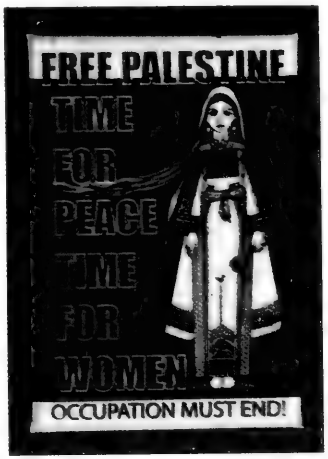
"We support the right to self-determination for Palestinians, and we support the right for Jews and Palestinians to live in peace. We believe that ending the occupation is the first step in order to realize that goal.

"We are dismayed by the attempts to silence dissent on this issue in Toronto. Those criticizing the bookstore have equated criticism of Israel with being anti-Jewish. We believe that an end to the occupation is part of the struggle against anti-Semitism. We recognize that anti-Jewish and anti-Arab attacks in Canada and around the world have been on the increase. We condemn those attacks."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the clenched fist that appears in the centre of one of the buttons is more a symbol of solidarity than a symbol of violence.

"My interpretation is that there are groups within the women's movement who have chosen to take a particular position.

"To some, the situation is driven by the so-called occupation. That is clearly not a shared opinion. The store has the right to hold its position, but [that position] is regrettable.



"I believe it is simplistic to place the blame at the feet of the Israelis. This approach denies the facts of Middle East history pre-1967," Rudner said.

Said Zaretsky: "It's a free country. They have every right to sell their buttons, but I strongly feel that we, the Jewish community of Toronto, should express how we feel about their behaviour by not buying their books."

Inappropriate musing

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is correct in wanting to ameliorate the misery and the poverty in which so much of the world's people are forced to live. He is to be commended for expressing, let alone, holding that view. But he is completely wrong to imply that there was any, even the slightest, correlation between the misery that exists in parts of the world and the massive murderous attacks that were perpetrated on the United States last September. And he deserves to be harshly criticized for implying the existence of that correlation in his interview with the CBC that aired last week.

It does not gainsay the need to mobilize the advanced, industrialized world on behalf of the non-advanced, unindustrialized world, to deny that Osama bin Laden's soldiers struck America for any reason other than sheer radical, religious zealotry.

Bin Laden's grievances against the United States are theological and cultural. They are not economic or developmental. He has said as much himself citing, as his foremost reason among many, the presence of U.S. (read: infidel) soldiers and especially women U.S. soldiers on Saudi (read: Islamic) territory. He also added, of course, the close association between the U.S. and Israel (read: the Jews) as another flint that has sparked his hatred for the United States.

Nor is Osama bin Laden, or any other member of Al Qaeda, representative of the plight of the sorrowful "poor" of the world for whom Chrétien feels such laudable empathy. Bin Laden and many of his comrades are among the wealthiest, most educated and most privileged people on earth. Like the Taliban regime that harboured him, bin Laden's chief aspiration has been singularly focused: to impose on others a form of society that exactly reflects his own perfect image.

To tie his radical, xenophobic, intolerant, violent, anti-democratic, anti-western, anti-Semitic outlook and actions to the predicament of the world's "poor" is actually an affront to the poor, most of whom simply want the opportunity to live in peace and to build a life for their families. Bin Laden speaks only for those who share his view of a world with no fundamental rights or freedoms, and certainly, with no State of Israel.

We caught a glimpse of the way such a world might look when, in downtown Montreal last week, a pack of protesters set upon Concordia University's Hall Building to thwart former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking openly and publicly. They wreaked havoc on the building and on some of the people, all of them Jews, who had hoped to hear Netanyahu speak. As police stood by, watching but not intervening, they also wreaked havoc on the core values and characteristics of Canadian life. All that remained after the violence ended was our resolve to know well and beware of the thugs who tried to steal our rights. If there was no conceivable justification for the Montreal violence, as the prime minister asserted the following day in Ottawa, how in good conscience, let alone logic, could he muse about a justification for Sept. 11?

Focus was misinterpreted

It is unfortunate that both Michael Brown ("Canadian academics and Israel," CJN, Sept. 12) and Ed Morgan ("Israel's advocates should focus on the right targets," CJN, Sept. 12) appear to have misinterpreted the essence of our essay about the treatment of Israel at Canadian universities and colleges ("Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challenge Mideast distortion," CJN, Aug. 22).

We have nothing but the greatest of respect for our colleagues, Jewish and non-Jewish, who vigorously work to promote an Israeli perspective on campus. Rather than belittling their efforts, we were in fact trying to draw attention to the numerous challenges currently confronting the pro-Israel community on Canadian campuses and to recommend practical ways for the organized Jewish community to address these challenges. One of our ideas was the establishment of a national body that could attract a "critical mass" of honest, intellectual discourse about Israel among Canadian academics while at the same time serving as an institutionalized mechanism for facilitating the exchange of Israeli and Canadian scholars.

Brown and Morgan are both right on one point. We are not attempting here to reinvent the wheel, inasmuch as the type of institution described above previously existed, at a relatively minimal cost to the Jewish community. Let's work together to direct our limited resources toward confronting the real adversary – academic colleagues who treat Israel unfairly. We definitely consider ourselves to be part of the solution, not part of the problem.

Re: Canadian pro-Israeli academics

In speaking of the "systematic global campaign to delegitimize Israel," David Goldberg and Tilly Shames imply we have no choice but to be either pro-Israeli or pro-Palestinian ("Canadian pro-Israeli academics must challenge Mideast distortion," CJN, Aug. 22). While I agree that we must condemn hate and calls for Israel's destruction, I do not believe that all criticisms of Israel – from both Jews and non-Jews – espouse an entirely anti-Israel perspective.

By reducing the discourse in our community to "us" or "them," we fail to engage in the glaring ethical dilemmas these criticisms bring to light and the valuable insights they offer. The act of self-criticism, while painful, is an invaluable part of a diverse, peaceful society.

Thus, I question Goldberg and Shames' unconditional assertion that obliges the Jewish community to exclusively "encourage Jewish academics... to speak out confidently on Israel's behalf." Rather than adhere to an uncompromising agenda that assumes it is immune to criticism, I call on Jewish academics to cultivate a more enriching and complex discourse that embraces and negotiates with differences rather than punishing and labelling them. Perhaps through such a process, we can sort through "the distortion of the facts" without asserting that "our" viewpoint is the sole representative of truth. Is it not possible, for the benefit of everyone, to develop more nuanced positions combining the essential elements of both the pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian stances? A commitment to fulfilling this is necessitated by the realization that the prosperity of the Israeli people is dependent upon the prosperity of the Palestinian people.

A tragic day

Last week, I was among the hostages assembled in Concordia University's Hall Building – a prisoner of a Middle East mob composed of supporters of Al Qaeda, Al-Aqsa, Tanzim and suicide bombers. As a Holocaust survivor, the despicable spectacle reminded me of the European pogroms of the 1930s.

As an alumnus of Concordia, it particularly pained me to witness firsthand the fruits of the university's mismanagement, and its blatant inability to control the fascist, Nazi and destructive elements that have emerged from within the university.

Last week, the world had a taste of how political debate is conducted in the Middle East.

Last week, I cried as I witnessed the conquerors of the Middle East imposing on Montreal their distorted version of political debate.

Last week, I shed tears at having evidenced the mob embodiment of the Al-Aqsa "martyrs" sharing with Montrealers their Middle Eastern "civilization."

I also witnessed the total bankruptcy of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Montreal police force and the City of Montreal authorities – all of whom turned a blind eye while people were spat at, pushed to the ground and forcibly prevented from entering the campus to hear former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu speak.

Last week will forever stand as a black and tragic day for Montreal, Quebec and Canada.

Kristallnacht in Canada

I was profoundly shocked that what happened in Germany at Kristallnacht in 1938 happened in Canada now. Roughnecks did what they wanted and the police did nothing. As I am still a Canadian, I urge Concordia University rector Frederick Lowy to expel the roughnecks, apologize to former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanhayu and invite him again.

Hopes dashed for release of Iranian Jews

By MICHAEL JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Another Jewish New Year has come and gone, and eight Iranian Jewish prisoners remain locked up in Iran on charges they spied for Israel.

Some observers had tracked recent rumours that the Islamic regime, with its membership in U.S. President George W. Bush's "axis of evil," might be rethinking some of its policies – including a possible pardon for a group of pious Jews believed to have been wrongly jailed in the first place.

For the third straight year, the lone Jewish member of the Iranian Parliament, Maurice Motamed, took to the floor of the legislative body in advance of Rosh Hashanah and appealed for freedom for the "Iran 10" – now down to eight, as two were released after serving their sentences.

Their release failed to materialize, though the authorities reportedly permitted their families to visit them in prison last Friday night to celebrate a Rosh Hashanah service together.

"We'd started seeing some changes with respect to attitudes toward religious minorities in general, and we were hoping this would translate into some actual movement on the ground," said Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the Iranian-American Jewish Federation in Los Angeles, a community that boasts some 40,000 Iranian Jews.

"As far as we're concerned, we always felt these people did not belong in prison, that the charges against them were wrong. We would welcome the pardoning of these prisoners as an excellent first step forward in a more equitable treatment of religious minority groups."

That the holiday passed without the prisoners' release did not surprise more pessimistic Iran-watchers, who have long maintained that the mullahs in charge are deaf to international concerns and never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity to offer a goodwill gesture.

"I don't think they're smart enough to make these kinds of overtures," said Pooya Dayanim, spokesperson for the L.A.-based Council of Iranian-American Jewish Organizations.

"If they understood good PR work, they wouldn't have put these men in jail to begin with – and they wouldn't have landed in the 'axis of evil.'"

Thirteen Iranian Jewish men were first arrested in January and March 1999 and eventually charged with spying for the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence service.

Their real offence, said American Jewish observers, was that their increasingly devout observance of Orthodox Judaism became a source of irritation to the authorities.

Most of the men were religious leaders and came from the southern Iranian city of Shiraz, said to be a bastion of religious conservatism in general.

The arrests, it was believed, were intended as a signal to the rest of the community.

But the issue was soon sucked into the vortex of the political dynamic at the time – a power struggle between conservative forces, led by Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and the reformist faction, led by President Mohammad Khatami, observers said.

The Islamists seized upon the issue to whip up anti-Israel fervour, which is often seen as a galvanizing factor among all Iranians.

In May 2000, after more than a year in solitary confinement, the Jews were brought before Iran's Revolutionary Court to deliver "confessions" that they had indeed spied for Mossad.

During the process, media and foreign observers were barred from the courtroom, the prosecutor served as judge and Israel said it had had no contact with the men. Most foreign diplomats and human-rights activists assailed the process as a sham.

Initially, it was feared the men might be executed. Since the Islamic Revolution in 1979, 17 Jews have been condemned to death, primarily for being accused spies.

But three of the 13 were acquitted, with the other 10 convicted on July 1, 2000, on various national-security charges. They were sentenced to terms ranging from four to 13 years.

The men appealed, and under international criticism, Tehran reduced the jail time in 2000 to two to nine years.

In March 2001, merchant Ramin Nematizadeh, who had taught religious school, was released after serving out his term.

And this past January, a second Jew, Hebrew teacher Faramarz Kashi, completed his term.

For the remaining eight, their lone hope seems to be a pardon from Khamenei.

Much of the Iranian Jewish community – both here and in Iran – has become resigned to the prisoners' fate.

"Iran now has too much to face besides this issue," Dayanim said.

"Unless Iran feels that releasing the prisoners will win them some kind of international brownie points, they will remain in prison and serve out their sentences."

Currently, with Iran's unemployment rate – which at an estimated 14 per cent, is particularly hard on the young and educated – and its stifling social restrictions, the significant strata of university students are reportedly ever more restive and disappointed with Khatami's promises of reform.

But it's not only U.S. Jews who are keeping up the pressure.

Foreign dignitaries visiting Tehran continue a steady drumbeat of criticism of Iran's treatment of its minorities, including the Jews behind bars.

In late July, for example, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy and security chief, listed the concerns that impede improved relations between Iran and Europe: disregard for human rights, a muzzled media, acquisition of weapons of mass destruction and meddling in the Middle East.

For its part, Washington has become increasingly concerned about Iran's support for Palestinian terror groups. Iran has long been aiding Islamic Jihad and Hamas in the Palestinian territories, and Hezbollah on Israel's northern border.

And in January, ties between Iran and the Palestinian Authority surfaced with the Israeli interception of the Karine-A, a ship carrying more than 50 tons of weapons from Iran to the Gaza Strip.

Bush's now-famous "axis of evil" speech followed on Jan. 29.

Some in Washington suggest that Iran poses a much greater threat to Israel and the West than Iraq.

If nothing else, Iran's inclusion in the axis may be playing a part in Tehran's recent rally to the defence of arch-nemesis Iraq as Iran seeks to form a united front against Israel and the United States.

But as relations began to thaw, some thorny issues of the past have resurfaced.

Iraq, for example, is home to an Iranian dissident group, while Iran shelters an anti-Iraq dissident group of its own. When regimes both asked for the other to boot out the opposition groups, it re-opened old wounds.

Javeed Beit Yakov greets his family at his trial three years ago.

The insults they exchanged focused on which nation is truly in bed with the "Zionists."

"You will not find a single episode in history when the Persians have co-operation with the Arabs against the Zionists," said Iraqi Vice-President Taha Yassin Ramadan.

To which, in the words of the Iran's Islamic Republic News Agency, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Hamid-Reza Asefi replied: "Baghdad had become a supporter of the Zionist regime by waging a destructive war on Iran, sowing the seeds of discord among Muslim nations."

Meanwhile, Iran's intense focus on Israel's actions against the Palestinians – coupled with the widely publicized arrest of the Shirazi Jews on spying charges – has fomented a hostile climate for Iran's remaining Jews, Dayanim said.

An estimated 22,000 to 25,000 Jews still live in the country, down from a peak of 100,000 or so before the 1979 revolution.

Dayanim said he has heard of Jewish children being beaten and harassed at school, with their fathers accused of being "Zionists."

"We're actively engaged in efforts to increase emigration," he said, but added that those efforts are hindered by the obstacles Jews face in trying to liquidate their assets.

Those seeking to immigrate to the United States also face greater scrutiny from American immigration and FBI officials because of the new post-Sept. 11 restrictions.

Kermanian, meanwhile, remains optimistic about the future of Iran's Jews.

"Jews have lived in Iran for 2,500 years, always lived there as loyal citizens and they loved their country," he said.

"Even though there were ups and downs, Iranians and Jews found a way to live together in peace and co-operation. I have no doubt that with some goodwill, those days will return."

The remaining eight Iranian prisoners are listed under the "Let My People Go" headline on the CJN*'s editorial page every week.*

A visit with Robert St. John

Whenever I have occasion to remember my days during World War II, I think of one particular problem that faced me during the years I served with the U.S. Army in the fight against the Nazis. Aside from the basic need to survive the assaults of the enemy, there was the problem of staying in touch with my family in the United States.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Military censorship prohibited me from letting them know where my division was located. Only much later did I learn that they knew all along the general area where we were fighting, for an American correspondent often reported about the exploits of our division. He was none other than the famous Robert St. John, one of the best-known foreign correspondents of the time. Ever since, I have felt a special tie to this man who, without my knowledge, kept my family aware of our division's welfare, and therefore of mine as well.

He has now passed his 100th birthday, and I had the privilege of visiting him recently in his suburban Washington, D.C., home.

Naturally, I told him of his role in my family's life during the war, and he in turn shared some of his memories of that time and of the days when he, a non-Jew, was sent by his New York newspaper to cover Israel's War of Independence in 1948. Since then he has made news with his books, among which the biographies of David Ben-Gurion, Abba Eban and Eliezer Ben-Yehuda are probably the best known.

My friend, Janice Blumberg, who took me to see him, wrote this of St. John and his wife Ruth:

"Robert and Ruth are both truly remarkable people. Their zest for life, their keen sensitivity for the problems of the world, and their ongoing ability to entertain as well as to be entertained are unsurpassed by anyone I have ever had the pleasure of knowing. Their modest home is filled, wall to wall and ceiling to floor, with paintings, sculpture and fascinating objects they have brought from all over the world.

"Of all their qualities that endear them to everyone who knows them, the most admirable for many of us is their outspoken adherence to liberal causes, and their support of leaders and organizations that uphold them. An evening with the St. Johns is like walking into a living op-ed page with no reactionaries."

For those of my readers who are interested in becoming acquainted with some of St. John's writings, I suggest Jews, Justice and Judaism, Ben-Gurion: Builder of Israel, and Tongue of the Prophets, the story of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, the father of modern Hebrew.

Back with a fresh view

There's nothing like returning home after an extended period abroad to freshen one's senses about life in Israel. It is now precisely one week since I came back from two months in Canada, and already my summer sojourn is fast receding into memory, overtaken by the intense reality here.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

My first days back in Jerusalem afforded me an unusual perspective, albeit a temporary one. It put the contrast between Toronto and my adopted home in the Middle East into sharp focus. Even in my jet-lagged state, as I reconnected with my life in Israel, I constantly experienced new-old impressions, sensations and observations.

I savoured this renewed sense of discovery, knowing it would not last long. Almost like a tourist, I marvelled (and sometimes cringed) at what I saw, aware that inevitably I will once again pretty much take such customs, traits and idiosyncrasies for granted the rest of the year.

So before I fully sink back into my Israeli reality, I'm jotting down some of the things that have caught my eye or crossed my mind recently. Many are obvious, some are profound, still others are banal, but all of them illustrate something about life in Israel, or Jerusalem, to varying degrees.

In no particular order, I was struck by:

- the insanely high prices in supermarkets;
- the total absence of billboards in Jerusalem;
- the number of people who asked me why I did not stay in Canada when I had the chance;
- the incredible taste of pears;
- the shameless littering in public places, especially parks;
- the quality of Israeli music on local radio and how great it is to hear it again;
- the special something in the air in Jerusalem;
- the resilience of people in the face of the Palestinian terrorist campaign;
- the heat of September;
- the relentless drumbeat of news;
- the impossible economics of life here;
- the light at sundown;
- the Mediterranean influence;
- the relative calm on the surface, although it has only been five weeks since the Hebrew University terror bombing;
- the concern and compassion people have for their country;
- the preparation for, and lead-up to, Rosh Hashanah;
- the seeming inability of people to allow others to get out of an elevator before rushing in themselves;
- the relative lack of pretense of Israelis;
- the high decibel level when people speak;
- the amount of dust in the air;
- the number of people going out in the evening despite the fear of new attacks;
- the sight of armed security guards at the entrance to every café and restaurant;
- the huge number of stray cats in the streets;
- the tiny number of homeless people in the streets (despite the economic adversity);
- the contrast between the image of Israel in the foreign media and the reality on the ground;
- the more satisfying taste of coffee here;
- the great look of Israeli youth;
- the disturbing number of smokers and dearth of smoke-free places;
- the incorrigibly aggressive driving habits of Israelis;
- the creative parking talents of local drivers;
- the low priority given to pedestrians;
- the shameless use of car horns;
- the arid Jerusalem cityscape deprived of rain since last spring;
- the imposing sense of so little space;
- the number of building sites despite a continuing real estate slump;
- the use of stone in building facades;
- the non-use of hard hats by construction workers;
- the excellent taste of local cottage cheese;
- the near-extinct species known as "foreign tourists in Israel;"
- the vibrancy of political debate in the media and in the street;
- the magic of a warm, late summer night in Jerusalem.

It all adds up, and yet there is of course so much more. Much of it serves to remind me why this country still has a hold on me and so many others. But you have to be here to fully understand that.

Readers can contact Robert Sarner at rsarner@netvision.net.il.

Moving in the right direction

By any measure, 5762 was a difficult and depressing year for Israel and the Jewish people. Brutal Palestinian terror attacks took hundreds of lives and injured thousands, and the images of horror from the seder night in Netanya will remain indelibly engraved in our memories. In addition, there were assaults against synagogues, community centres and individual Jews throughout the world, while governments pretended they were "isolated incidents."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

However, in the longer term, the past year may also emerge as a turning point, when the propaganda used to justify these attacks was finally exposed and the Jewish people regained their ability to fight back.

In some parts of the press, the automatic condemnation of Israel has ended, or at least the scope has been reduced. An increasing number of journalists, political leaders and diplomats around the world, including Canada, have stopped repeating the Palestinian myths that occupation and settlements are the root of all violence. The hidden history of terrorism has been restored, in particular the violence that took place long before the 1967 war and was (and remains) aimed at the destruction of Jewish sovereignty in Israel.

Following the leads of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and then U.S. President George W. Bush, even the usually soft Europeans have withdrawn their support for Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, recognizing that the Palestinian leadership is corrupt and composed of unreformed terrorists.

The BBC, the CBC, Reuters and other media outlets continue to allow Palestinian and other terrorists to hide behind terms such as "activists" and "fighters," but this practice is coming under increasing scrutiny and criticism.

From this perspective, 5762 can also be seen as the year that the Jewish people regained their collective voice and redoubled the commitment to the survival of Israel. The inherent democracy of the Internet has allowed for the wide circulation of independent sources of information and analysis that are not part of the "conventional wisdom" or the politically correct pro-Palestinian bias.

Using these resources, community organizations have mobilized to protest the biased agendas that focus exclusively on Palestinian "victimization," and to ensure that the myths and false slogans in the press are never left unanswered.

Without this activity, the Palestinian lies about a massacre in Jenin would have been accepted at face value. Working together, Jewish organizations also reversed some of the damage from the UN conference on racism that took place in Durban, South Africa, last September, and ensured that the Johannesburg conference on the environment was not turned into another Israel-bashing platform.

In addition, during the past year, the fallacy of the slogan that "acts of terrorism cannot be ended by military action" was exposed. Israeli security forces acted with a high level of professionalism and bravery to uproot the deeply entrenched Palestinian terrorist networks. In door-to-door fighting and extensive searches, weapons and explosives have been located and destroyed. The much-criticized policy of "targeted killings" has disrupted each of the terror groups and greatly impeded their ability to conduct deadly attacks.

Similarly, after 9/11, the U.S. military campaign in Afghanistan removed the Taliban from the scene, ending the safe haven provided to Al Qaeda terrorists. (The Americans took far less chances than Israel, relying primarily on high altitude bombing.) Although a series of errors apparently allowed Osama Bin Laden to escape, efforts to launch more attacks during the past year have failed.

It is far too early to declare victory, and while the trend has shifted for the better, much work remains to be done. The terror groups have not given up by any means, and attempts to kill Israelis and hijack aircraft to use against western targets continue. The threats from Iraq, Syria and elsewhere have not been subdued, and the anti-Israel myths and slogans from the politically correct vocabulary still dominate university campuses and much of the media.

Last year constituted an important beginning on this road, but the work must continue and expand in 5763.

The saga of the Jewish mestizos of Iquitos

During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, when the rubber boom in the Amazon rainforest was at its apogee, the remote Peruvian settlement of Iquitos, which can only be reached by air or water, morphed into a full-fledged city.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Enticed by the prospect of striking it rich, and allured by the prospect of adventure in a new land, thousands of immigrants streamed into Iquitos.

Among the arrivals were Jews from Brazil, Europe and Morocco.

When rubber prices sputtered after 1911, nearly two-thirds of the Jewish settlers departed, leaving behind a handful of Jews who were completely integrated into the local community through intermarriage.

The descendants of these Jews, most of whom married Indian women, are known today as "Jewish mestizos." In appearance, they strongly resemble Peruvians of mixed race, and in name, they are Roman Catholics.

And yet, as Ariel Segal writes in Jews of the Amazon: Self Exile in Paradise (The Jewish Publication Society), they consider themselves Jews. Hewing to what he describes as a "syncretic identity," they feel palpably connected to the Jewish people, and celebrate Jewish – and Christian – holidays. They often bury their dead in the Jewish cemetery – purchased by their forefathers in 1895 – and many dream of making aliyah. Some, indeed, already live in Israel.

Like the descendants of the Jews of Belmonte, Portugal, they teeter on the edge of extinction due to their isolation from mainstream Jewish communities.

Having formed a unique hybrid culture, they fluidly intertwine Christian, Jewish and Amazonian cultural references into what, he claims, is a "perfectly coherent system of beliefs."

Segal cites a conversation he had with an old women in Iquitos, as recorded in his diary: "She tells me how proud she is of belonging to the chosen people, and then asks me why Jews don't accept Christ as god, as if that is an unquestioned fact. [She] rigorously observes Shabbat, refraining from cooking and using electricity, reciting psalms from her Old Testament in Spanish translation, but every Saturday she asks her maid, her Shabbes Goy, to turn on the radio to listen to the weekly broadcast of Evangelical Christians."

To drive home the point, he cites another entry in his diary: "One of the leaders of the Jewish community, whose house has become the prayer site for every Shabbat, is raising a pig in his backyard for a future banquet."

The deracination of Iquitos' original Jewish inhabitants was incremental, explains Segal, who was born in Caracas, Venezuela, and now lives in Israel.

Circumcision was the first Jewish custom to disappear, and gradually, worshippers forgot all but the Shema prayer of the Hebrew liturgy. Eventually, he adds, their Judaism was reduced to " a few misshapen ceremonies" for the major holidays, the weekly lighting of Shabbat candles and burial rites.

In time, like the Marranos, they mingled Jewish and Christian customs, lost their sense of Jewish peoplehood and submitted to such church formalities as baptisms, weddings and funerals. Their children attended Catholic schools, but in order to be accepted as students, they had to be baptized.

And so it went.

The process of assimilation was doubtless accelerated by Iquitos' tolerant atmosphere, and Segal claims, its lack of anti-Semitism. Anti-Jewish feeling, however rare, did exist. One Jewish mestizo recalls: "The Jews were scorned here a long time ago. People spit on them. They hated Jews."

> They mingled Jewish and Christian customs in the vast Amazon rainforest

Be that as it may, Jews were absorbed into Iquitos' society. Even today, Jewish mestizos who try to practise Judaism cannot escape the overwhelming influence of the church.

"To be Jewish in a place like this is to be a weird animal," a third generation descendant of Jews, Ronald Reategui Levy, told Segal. "It is to have a different social behaviour than the rest of the people."

Segal says that residents of Iquitos such as Levy have created a new religion, neither strictly Christian nor Jewish, but rather something in between.

For example: Jews registered with the Sociedad Israelita de Iquitos, which was established in 1909, have the right to be buried in the Jewish cemetery. Yet many receive a Christian funeral before being interred in the Jewish cemetery. According to Segal, it connects them to their Jewish ancestors. It is their only "tangible link" with their parents and grandparents.

Until about 40 years ago, Jewish mestizos were virtually unknown to the Jews of Lima, where Peru's Jewish community is concentrated. But in 1966, Jewish organizations in Lima launched an active campaign to make its members aware of their existence.

After visiting them in Iquitos, Lima's Jewish communal leaders suggested that the rebirth of an organized Jewish community in Iquitos should be encouraged, and that books relating to Judaism should be sent.

Hard on the heels of these developments, the Israeli embassy in Lima dispatched to Iquitos books, magazines, films and radio tapes about Jewish history.

These efforts were beneficial. But in 1968, the president of the representative association of Lima's three synagogues informed the Jewish mestizos that their capacity to provide financial aid was very limited.

As a result, projects that had been envisioned to bring the mestizos back to Judaism – the building of a Jewish school and a shul, to name but two – petered out.

Yet, thanks to the work of a few dedicated families, a semblance of Jewish life has been maintained in the green depths of the vast Amazon jungle.

For the past 12 years, Segal reports, the younger descendants of Jewish pioneers have discovered Jewish traditions in the home of Victor Edery, the scion of an early Jewish settler. Here they celebrate Jewish holidays and Shabbat.

And through Israel, they express their connection with the Jewish world. During the 1967 Six Day War, they sent a modest donation to their "distant homeland."

In recent years, several Jewish mestizos have immigrated to Israel under the Law of Return, having formally converted to Judaism there. Interestingly enough, they prove their Jewish ancestry by displaying photographs of their fathers' and grandfathers' tombstones in the Jewish cemetery.

Ronald Reategui Levy and one of his children.

Segal is clearly impressed by their dogged determination to cling to their heritage. As he puts it: "I was a Jew in a community of people who wanted desperately to be Jewish and were fighting to preserve their identity in the face of challenges from their own environment and the skepticism of mainstream Jewish institutions.

"Somehow, Iquitos' Jewish descendants were more Jewish than I was from the standpoint of their stubbornness in preserving the identity of their Jewish ancestors."

Segal's plea is certainly heartfelt. Unfortunately, Jews of the Amazon falls short of being a first-rate book. It is haphazardly organized and somewhat repetitious. Though the journey through the thickets of his narrative can be arduous, the destination is a worthwhile one.

Drugs made me feel good inside, says addict

The following is the second in a series on drug abuse in the Jewish community.

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

"I don't think I was born an addict," Daniel says nervously. "It's more like I became an addict the first time I tried a drug."

With low-slung pants and an oversized T-shirt, Daniel (whose name has been changed to protect his identity) isn't just a "poser." Last year, the tall, 14-year-old Jewish boy with short-cropped hair and sheepish hazel eyes was suspended for selling drugs on school property. He says the 20-day suspension for dealing alerted his mother for the first time to the fact that drugs were a major part of her son's life.

Drug Abuse in the Jewish Community

"My mom's a new immigrant with three other children to look after. She's single and works real hard at a job that expects her there full time, even though she only gets paid for part time," Daniel says.

He doesn't blame his mother for reacting the way she did – with strict rules and curfews – and says he would probably do the same if it were his child. Except, he says, "I wouldn't call the cops on my own kid."

His mother called the police when Daniel missed a curfew.

She also forced him to come to his first JACS meeting. Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others is a group that provides resources for those who want help with drinking problems or drug abuse. It's often the first place people turn to when they realize they have a problem.

"I never wanted to come through that door," Daniel says. "I didn't think I really needed a recovery program."

"A lot of teens don't get help because they don't want to tell anyone they use drugs or they don't realize it's a problem," he says.

"I always thought all teens do drugs on a regular basis."

At 12 years old, Daniel tried marijuana for the first time when his friend's older sister offered him some. Marijuana is referred to by educators as the "gateway drug" because some users go on from there to other substances that will help them get high.

JACS' executive director Marla Goldman explained that while most people can control how much alcohol they drink or how much pot they smoke, the addict cannot.

"It's a disease like any other. The users aren't bad people, they're sick people who need to learn how to control their disease," she says.

Daniel started with pot, a little alcohol and the occasional 'shroom (magic mushrooms).

One thing led to another until he made his own connections and started to sell drugs inside and outside his school.

"Using the drugs made me feel good and just sort of numb inside. I guess there were a lot of things I didn't want to have to think about," he says.

His father suffered from depression and committed suicide with a gun that was kept in the house. Daniel was three years old when his brothers heard the shot and found the body. The family has been coping with the tragedy ever since.

Last year, JACS convinced Daniel to go to a rehabilitation centre for the first time.

"I wasn't sure what to expect and was pretty scared going up there," he says. "I thought I was going to a mental hospital or something."

At the rehabilitation centre, he found support and kids like him who needed help with their addictions. He also found that as the only Jewish teen in the group, he was constantly explaining what being a Jew was about. Kosher food was unavailable and Christianity was used as the spiritual guide for recovery.

Two of Daniel's brothers go to yeshiva and his family observes all the holidays with traditional meals and prayer. For Daniel, those events pose additional challenges. Every holiday that uses wine can be trigger points into drug and alcohol-related binges – the smell of the Friday night Kiddush cup can be a hurdle, the four cups of Passover a nightmare.

The month in rehab forced Daniel to think about a lot of things. The counsellors showed him that over 75 per cent of his day was drug-related and suggested other ways to fill his life. They taught him that it would be foolish to introduce his younger sibling to drugs because he might become responsible for their deaths.

Those 30 days of rehab and weekly aftercare group meetings kept Daniel off drugs for several months. But once during the summer, Daniel saw kids at work put out a half-used joint and it triggered something in him. He went back later that evening, picked it up and smoked it.

That night, the counsellor was sick and Daniel's group didn't meet. So he called his buddy from aftercare and they went looking for drugs instead of support.

That binge got him kicked out of the aftercare group and on to a cycle of alcohol, cocaine, Percocets and Tylenol-3s.

King Edward P.S. to celebrate 100th birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

King Edward Public School will celebrate its 100th anniversary with festivities planned for Sept. 29 to Oct. 3.

In 1872, the Bathurst Street School opened at the corner of College and Bathurst streets. In September 1902, the Toronto Board of Education renamed the school in honour of King Edward VII who ascended the throne of Britain the same year a new school was built.

Located at 112 Lippincott St., in the neighbourhood where several generations of Jews had their homes and businesses, King Edward holds memories for many in the Toronto Jewish community.

Ami Trefler, principal of King Edward, says the reunion will bring together graduates, students, parents, staff and community members.

"I am extremely proud to be associated with King Edward Public School, which has a long history in the downtown community. I have a special attachment to this area, as my father grew up just a few blocks from the school and some of my first memories are of the College and Bathurst neighbourhood."

The celebrations will begin with a centenary gala concert with Molly Johnson and Friends on Sunday, Sept. 29, followed by an alumni reunion and reception later in the day with photos, stories and memorabilia.

On Tuesday, there will be a screening of the National Film Board documentary, The Film Club, about the members of the King Edward film club. Discussion groups will follow.

On Thursday, students and staff will celebrate at a happy 100th anniversary party.

"I am so looking forward to being part of King Edward's public school reunion," Mae Waese, a King Edward alumna who served as a school trustee and former chair of the North York and Metro Toronto school boards told The CJN.

"Memories flood back as I recall my days at the school. Three of my closest friends – we are grandmothers now – attended the school, where our friendships began in our kindergarten year.

"It was a place to make lifetime friendships, get a strong basic education, and there are several teachers that left me with lasting memories."

Waese adds that attending King Edward was especially meaningful to her, as her mother attended the school in the early 1920s. "My mother introduced me to Miss Pomeroy and her principal, Mr. Allan – we didn't use first names in those days – which helped pave the way to a great experience at the school."

A special centenary project will be established with the proceeds of the concert, a silent auction and donations. The money raised will convert the outdated design and technology room, previously known as The Shop, into a modern information technology and resources centre.

"This is a huge undertaking," Trefler says. "We believe in the importance of this project, and we are confident that with the support of the school community and alumni, we can create the foundation for a resource centre that will serve our students well into our next century."

legacy of life

Lillian Shopsowitz 1924 - 1984

There was something truly remarkable about Lillian Shopsowitz.

With her sparkling blue eyes and luxurious blond hair, she was certainly a beauty, and as a young woman the local furrier often asked her to model the season's latest fashions. She was creative and artistic, an avid opera and art gallery patron, and the perfect hostess.

Still, what made Lillian Shopsowitz so exceptional was her inner beauty and incredible character.

"Lillian was extraordinarily beautiful, both in appearance and in spirit," recalls her youngest sister, Molly Nightingale. "She was absolutely gorgeous and just bloomed like a rose. She had a wonderful nature and would never turn away anybody who came to her door.

Molly and Lillian were the two Canadian-born children of Israel and Dvora Pearlstein, a loving couple from Kielc, Poland who fled to Canada to escape Eastern Europe's brutal pogroms. Israel arrived in Toronto in 1905 but had to wait 10 years – until the end of WWI – before he was able to send for Dvora and their two children, Florence and Benny. Lillian was born in Toronto in 1924 and Molly followed eight years later.

They may have had little money, but the Pearlsteins were rich in love. Their father was a warm, soft-spoken and extremely generous man who was extremely devoted to his family and his religion. As president of the Kielcer Shul, he was recruited by one of Ontario's first premiers to assist with the election campaign and, naturally, he gladly obliged. Dvora was a terrific cook and hostess and, much like her husband, wouldn't say no to anyone who needed her help.

With such role models, it's no wonder Lillian didn't fall far from the tree.

"I was in awe of her," says Molly. "It was hard to believe that someone could be so kind and generous."

The Shopsowitz family in Israel, 1966: From left - Noah, Shari, Sam, Alane and Lillian

When she was 23, Lillian fell in love with a man much like herself. Sam Shopsowitz, whose family owned the popular Monteith Inn in Muskoka, was a sweet and happy musician who played accordion and piano at Toronto's Royal York Hotel. One day, Sam was visiting his music teacher and had to make a phone call, so the teacher sent him across the street to ask the Pearlsteins if he could use their phone. When Sam saw Lillian's photo beside the phone, he was hooked, and a year later they were married.

Sam went on to build the Shopsy's food company, and as the business flourished both he and Lillian began devoting their time and money to numerous charitable causes. Sam was involved with Variety Village, while Lillian was active in Hadassah and ORT. Together they were major supporters of Beth Tzedec Congregation's museum, and the synagogue gift shop bears Lillian's name.

The State of Israel was also a big part of their lives. In fact, when two of their three children became B'nai Mitzvah the same year, Lillian led the family to Israel for a double celebration. The invitation asked guests to make a donation to Israel in lieu of gifts.

Lillian and Sam both died in 1984 – just 13 days apart – and in her will Lillian left an undirected bequest to be donated to charity in her name. After a visit to the UJA Federation's Jewish Board of Education, her son Noah established the Leah Shopsowitz Fund through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to provide funding for new film and video productions that promote Jewish culture. The Fund was first tapped into to purchase archival videotape for the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, which Noah says spawned Toronto's involvement in Steven Spielberg's Shoah project. The Leah Shopsowitz Fund has evolved into a vehicle for female Jewish filmmakers to complete their works. Among the beneficiaries: Francine Zuckerman's film Punch Me in the Stomach and Karen Shopsowitz's documentary My Grandparents had a Hotel about life at the Monteith Inn.

"My mother was a very creative person who really enjoyed the arts," says son Noah. "She was very interested in sculpture, drawing and art and always encouraged me to pursue a creative career.. The Leah Shopsowitz Fund is a good reflection of the type of activities she was involved in. I know she would have felt very strongly about supporting Canadian Jewish women in this way."

Says Molly Nightingale, "she was a true daughter of Israel."

Reform shuls to take part in Israel teach-in

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 300 Reform congregations across North America, including six from Ontario, are set to take part in a teach-in on Israel on Sept. 29.

The day of learning is part of the Reform movement's effort to mobilize North American Jews in support of Israel and to provide a forum for open discussion and debate about the Mideast peace process.

The program, titled In Search of Peace and Security: A National Teach-in on Israel, is organized by the Union of Hebrew Congregations, the Reform congregational umbrella group.

Designed in part to debate Mideast peace process

Organizers said in a written statement that the teach-in, which coincides with the two-year anniversary of the latest Palestinian uprising, is meant to educate North American Jews, "many of whom feel confused about the complexities behind the conflict, and to get Jews more engaged and active in helping Israel and the peace process."

Participants will be provided with a package of background material including opinion pieces, reading lists, Internet resources, selections of Jewish religious and Zionist texts, the PBS Frontline documentary Shattered Dreams of Peace: the Road From Oslo and a list of elected officials to contact about re-starting the peace process.

Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) said the teach-in is meant to encourage all Canadian Reform congregations to think seriously about issues in the Middle East and become engaged in serious discussions.

"Our goals are to give people the tools to make informed decisions, and to unite Reform congregations by studying the same issues on the same day," she said.

The Ontario congregations involved in the teach-in are Temple Israel, London; Solel Congregation, Mississauga; Shaarei-Beth El Congregation, Oakville; Temple Israel, Ottawa; Holy Blossom Temple and Temple Emanu-El.

Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Solel Congregation said that issues about the Middle East are complex and "must be raised above the lowest common denominator.

"We want to provide open information sessions from all points of perspective. The Reform movement has been consistent with arriving at a two-state solution, and we will explore that avenue."

At Holy Blossom Temple, Bebe Jacobs, director of education, said it is essential now more than ever to feel connected to the situation and to support Israel in its time of crisis.

"Unless people have an opportunity to learn, they will not know how to consider the situation," said Jacobs.

Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation said his congregants are showing their solidarity by coming together at the same time as other congregants across North America.

"I hope that this is the start of another level of discussion and information. It is very exciting to be part of a program that is unifying several hundred Reform congregations," said Rabbi Sidolfsky.

Cappe enjoys photography, travel and books as well as the company of his children, who attended a Jewish school in Ottawa.

Danny, 26, a graduate of Queen's University, worked in the high-tech sector in Ottawa and Toronto. Currently, he studies law at the University of Toronto.

Emily, 24, resides in Vancouver and works for an upscale Italian restaurant.

Cappe said that his children are "the most important part" of his life.

When he lived in Ottawa, he was a member of Agudath Israel Congregation.

In the past, he chaired the public service division of the United Jewish Appeal and the United Way campaigns.

Last year, he was chair of the United Way campaign.

A drug addict tells his story

"Sometimes I even drank cough syrups for the dextromorphan," he says. "Anything to get high."

"I know it's wrong," Daniel says. "And I know that I'm always looking for an excuse to get high. I need to be completely convinced that I want to stay sober. Right now, there's 20 per cent of me that still wants to be high."

But there's another part of Daniel that likes music, wants to become a social worker, a devoted husband and a caring father with children who don't use drugs.

Daniel is hoping to go back to a rehab centre soon where he could spend anywhere from several months to two years. He says he's looking forward to it.

Grade 2 advice to Grade 1

Several Jewish day schools approached their Grade 2 students and asked what advice they would give to the excited and nervous incoming Grade 1 class.

Below is a compilation of the responses:

•Associated Hebrew Day School: If you forget your homework, don't tell a lie. You can probably do it the next day and bring it then.

• Netivot HaTorah Day School: Grade 1 is a little easy and a little hard so it's O.K. if you're a little nervous. But don't worry, your friends will meet you in the playground.

• TJA Or Menachem Academy: Don't be late for recess, it's the best. And by the way, come back to class after recess, it isn't home time yet.

• Toronto Heschel School: Never sit next to someone you are going to talk to or you'll get in trouble, and when you are running in the playground make sure you don't bump into the little kids. Watch out for math – it's hard.

• Leo Baeck Day School: Don't talk when the teacher is talking. If someone is alone outside at recess, invite them to play.

• Netivot HaTorah Day School: Don't forget – if your tooth falls out in class, give it to Mrs. Krasman for a tooth-note mazel tov.

DISCOVER ISRAEL
Welcome To The Desert
The desert is often described as a forbidding, bleak landscape which strangers should avoid. But not in Israel, where the Negev welcomes tourists with dozens of exciting attractions and adventure tours that have survived the sands of time.
Ein Gedi – Only about an hour from Jerusalem, this is an unparalleled desert nature reserve on the Dead Sea shore, with waterfalls, wildlife, caves, and, most importantly, lots of shade. Ein Gedi is also rich in history. King Solomon used Ein Gedi's tranquil setting to compose the Song of Songs.
Ben Gurion Museum, Sde Boker – It was the dream of Israel's first Prime Minister, David Ben Gurion, to settle the Negev, and true to his word, he and his wife, Paula, joined this desert kibbutz, south of Beersheba, after his retirement. Here, in this unlikely location, is the Ben Gurion home, a popular tourist attraction transformed into a museum, with household furniture and a library of 5,000 volumes still intact.
The Ramon Crater – Measuring 400 meters deep, it's the world's largest natural crater - one of only five found on the planet and three of them are in Israel! You can hike through the crater or admire its beauty from above while learning about its formation, before heading toward relaxing Eilat on the Red Sea, just a short distance away.
Now is the time to visit Israel when your presence will make such a significant difference. We can provide you with a complete list of upcoming missions to Israel and individual travel options. Contact the Israel Government Tourist Office today.
After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

Jewish Life

There are no simple answers

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

There is a story about a rabbi who mediated a dispute between two congregants. The congregants went to the rabbi's house, and the first, Yankel, walked into the study and gave his side of the case. The rabbi listened intently and then exclaimed, "You're right!" The next congregant, Berel, came into the study, and argued his side. Again, the rabbi exclaimed, "You're right!" The rabbi's wife, who was watching, said, "First you told Yankel he was right, then you told Berel he was right. How can they both be right?" To which the rabbi replied, "You're also right!"

It is unrealistic for the rabbi, who is either too good-hearted to reject one of the disputants or too weak to stand up to them, to say both sides are correct. But I think the rabbi is right; reality is often too complicated for black and white answers.

I know complexity isn't popular. We live in a world of the simple and swift; your life philosophy has to squeeze into a 30-second sound bite or it isn't relevant in the age of television. A few years ago, a popular diet and fitness guru sporting a crewcut, constantly shouted the catch phrase, "Stop the insanity!" She was a major hit, and her infomercials were on 24 hours a day. This guru was truly a teacher for our generation; she was able to condense her life philosophy into three words. The hapless rabbi in the story, who sees complexity in every situation, would never have been invited on talk shows or to sign book deals.

There is nothing wrong with simple, easy-to-understand philosophies of life. There are many good Jewish sound bites. One example comes from the Gemarah, when the prospective convert asks Hillel to teach him the Torah while standing on one foot, and Hillel responds, "Love your neighbour as yourself is the entire Torah; all the rest is commentary."

It is important to have general life principles. Dozens of major Jewish works start with the words, "The foundation of foundations," where the author briefly explains the foundation of Jewish life. Indeed, this is the very ideology of monotheism: one God, one focus, one goal. If you believe in God, there can only be one goal in life.

But simple goals don't always yield simple answers. Often, after you pick your guru and choose your sound bite, a funny thing happens: you realize that real life is too complicated for one short clip. Many kabbalists note that although the source of all life is God, who is an absolute unity (and is symbolized by the letter aleph, which has a numerical value of one), the physical world is filled with diversity and complexity (symbolized by the letter ayin, which has a similar pronunciation, but has the numerical value of 70). There may be a simple, unifying being behind all of existence, but the world is filled with a fascinating, diverse array of life.

For this reason, simple answers don't always work. It is tempting to think that in matters of morality, there will always be absolute, categorical definitions of right and wrong. It is easy to think that if you are uncompromisingly honest or peaceloving, then you have done the right thing. In actuality, if you are radically honest, you run the risk of shaming other people and hurting their feelings; if you are an uncompromising pacifist, you will expose yourself and your family to the violence of criminals. As Sefer Kohelet (3:1) puts it: "For everything its season, and for every activity under heaven its time."

Complexity should not be considered an annoyance, as something that gets in the way of good, simple answers. Simplicity is for simpletons; complexity is what spurs our inner growth and creativity. Rav Soloveitchik argues that man is demanded to aspire to antithetical goals. Man is meant to be majestic and powerful, yet also humble and introspective; he is simultaneously drawn to the mundane aspirations of science and the transcendent aspirations of religion. It may be difficult to be torn in two directions, but out of the conflict between these goals arises human greatness.

Complexity is not an evil; it is the key to greatness. Great people know how to make love and make war; great people know the value of truth and the value of peace. Greatness is accepting the conflicts life presents, and recognizing that everything has its season.

Rabbi Steinmetz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal.

Closing the Jewish gap

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

To paraphrase the Czech novelist Milan Kundera, for many North American Jews in the past two years, "life is elsewhere." The main focus of attention has been Israel, as a brief resurrection of identity and feeling has gripped many otherwise marginally committed Jewish individuals in the Diaspora.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

But already the effects of overload are being seen on many American campuses, where young people simply do not want to maintain the sustained effort of an intellectual battle to defend Israel's actions. Many analysts bemoan students' lack of knowledge about Israel and Zionism, but in truth, this is merely a symptom of a larger gap in consciousness regarding Judaism itself.

One theme that Jewish history repeatedly dramatizes is the attempt to normalize – to pretend that Jews can be ordinary citizens of the world community, marching in the global multicultural pageant just like, say, France and Bolivia. The subsequent disappointment of learning yet again that such is not the fate of the chosen in a world that often likes its Jews downtrodden and downcast is exacerbated by our frustrating inability to crack the paradoxical code of anti-Semitism, with its breathtakingly circular ideology. They hate us because we are communists; because we are capitalists; because we are atheists; because we are God-fearing; because we are contemptuously separate; because we are spinelessly assimilated; because we are scrawny and silent and passive and feather-bodied and book drunk; because – in Israel today – we are olive-skinned and loud and muscular and sovereign and unyielding; because we are liberal; because we are reactionary; because we are indifferent to worldly events; because we conspire to dominate global affairs; because we subvert the boardroom (Karl Marx); because we undermine the bedroom (Sigmund Freud); because we are self-loathing (Noam Chomsky); because we loathe the other (Rabbi Meir Kahane); because we are too Jewish; because we are not Jewish enough. Because.

The overall ennui produced by this mind-numbing assault often leads to the worst possible outcome. Instead of learning from the precariousness of seeking approval from the outside and thus setting a course for Jewish self-enrichment and spiritual understanding, Jews invariably aspire after the keys to the corporate (and, as it were, cultural) washroom.

There have been several turning points in Jewish history. There is no doubt that another one is at hand. While we worry about societal acceptance or stock portfolios or making sure our children get into the right medical schools, Judaism burns. Even Israel is not the key to Judaism. It is Judaism that is the key to everything. We need to take stock – not tomorrow, but now – of what kind of destiny we are laying out for the next generation in terms of Jewish knowledge, intensity, skills and spirit.

This column is dedicated to my cousin, Levina Shapira, a woman of grace and compassion, intelligence and serenity. Levina died – vanished into the place where, as Chassidic thought puts it, God is crying – on July 31 in the Hebrew University bombing. May her memory, and all of those who have had their lives cut short, be for a blessing. We miss you.

Judging a curious novel

The Judges*, by Elie Wiesel, Knopf Publishing, 2002, $36 (Cdn).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The contrived plot of The Judges begins with an airliner en route to Israel that is forced to land in rural Connecticut in the midst of a violent snowstorm. The passengers are distributed to local households for food and shelter, and five of them end up in the log cabin of a sinister, sadistic figure who imprisons them in a sealed room and proclaims himself a judge. He then discloses to his incredulous prisoners that he intends to play a game, concerned with what is most precious to them, the power of the imagination. The helpless captives are informed that one of them, before the long night is over, will be an assassination victim.

The five passengers, as one would expect, are an assorted lot. They include Claudia, an attractive, self-confident, New York theatre press agent and director; Bruce, an aging philanderer, who at one time had studied for the priesthood; George, a scholarly archivist, who is on his way to deliver a secret document linking an Austrian government official with a massacre of Jews in the Kovno ghetto; and Yoav, an Israeli commando, who is dying from a terminal illness. The fifth passenger, the narrator of the story, is called Razziel, a name that can be translated as "the mysteries of God." He is the principal of a Brooklyn yeshiva and a talmudic scholar.

Each of these characters has a role to play as the drama unfolds, and they each makes it clear to themselves and the others why their life is important. In Razziel's case, it is to meet with a mysterious figure out of his past who may be able to remind him of the terrible events of his life before he turned 18.

It is clear that Wiesel is not writing a novel in the usual sense, but conveying important, if difficult, moral and theological ideas about the nature of good and evil, the persistence of memory, the finality of death, the significance of faith and the meaning of the Messiah.

Throughout the book, the judge makes philosophical pronouncements: "What is innocence? Personally, I don't believe in it. What is it, other than an excuse for imbeciles and a matter of luck for the lucky and the fools? For them, as for the rest of us, it's the tip of the iceberg that rises above the mountain of sins and crimes committed in its name that we all carry around with us. And what is life? A tiny wretched island amid the infinite and majestic ocean of death."

The judge insists that "For me, the absolute lies in evil... Truth no longer lies in life but in death... It is in death that justice is accomplished... Good has less power than evil and less possibility."

In the end, the judge's long-suffering hunchback servant engineers a way out for the passengers that is ultimately unconvincing.

Now, at 76, laden with honours including the Nobel Peace Prize in 1968, Wiesel has written a curious and cryptic novel. Despite its high-flown literary style and characters that are merely props for the author's ideas, Judges can be welcomed as a work steeped in Jewish thought and tradition by a gifted storyteller.

Etrog, lulav and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"And you shall take for yourselves on the first day the fruit of a beautiful tree (etrog), the branches of date palms (lulav), branches of the myrtle tree (hadasim) and branches of the willow tree (aravot), and you shall rejoice before Hashem, your God, for seven days." (Leviticus 23:40) [http://shlk.com/166]

These items listed in the above passage are simply three branches and an odd-looking fruit. But when these four species are bound together, something special happens: an annual ritual can be celebrated. Today, the etrog and lulav on the World Wide Web.

There are many interpretations about the significance of the lulav and etrog and similarities drawn between the four species to those of the Jewish people [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/sukkot/species.shtml].

All four species all have different physical qualities. For example, an etrog has both a pleasant taste and pleasant aroma. It is compared to a Jew who is learned in Torah and observant of the commandments. The myrtle twig is fragrant but tasteless. It represents Jews who are filled with good deeds but are not learned in Torah. But unless all four species are bound together, the mitzvah of lulav and etrog cannot be performed. Similarly, the Jewish people must be unified in order to be truly effective [http://www.aish.edu/calendar/sukkot/unity.htm].

Some look at the shape of each of the four species to learn other lessons. The lulav is said to resemble the backbone of man; the myrtle leaves, his eyes; the willow leaves, lips; and the etrog, the heart. The Inner Dimension gives a mystical explanation for each of the species, including their significance in gematriah, Jewish numerology [http://www.inner.org/times/tishrei/sukkot57.htm].

A superb lulav and etrog set doesn't come cheap. The Aish HaTorah site has tips on what to look for when shopping for a set. For example, the shape of an etrog should preferably be like a tower – wider at the bottom and narrow at the top – and even a small black dot on the upper part can invalidate it. Willow leaves should have a smooth edge, not serrated. And take a look at the very top of the lulav branch and make sure that the centre-most leaf is not split [http://www.aish.com/holidays/Sukkot/]. The Arba Minim Web site goes into even great detail about the rules for selecting a kosher lulav [http://www.campsci.com/sukkot/].

Which hand do you use to pick up the lulav? Should the etrog point up or down? In what order should the lulav be shaken? Which way should you face? Those questions are answered in a guide at the Jewish New Year Web site [http:// jewishnewyear.com/holidays/tishrei/4489].

Most of us think about etrogs once a year and really have no idea about the rich history of the citron (citrus medica) [http://www.hort.purdue.edu/newcrop/morton/citron.html]. Did you know that etrog seeds have been found in Mesopotamian excavations dating back 6,000 years? The armies of Alexander the Great are thought to have carried etrogs to the Mediterranean region about 300 B.C.E. In India, the peel is eaten to overcome bad breath. And in Panama, citron leaves are ground up and combined with other ingredients and given as an antidote for poison. Botanists can also read up about the myrtle (myrtus communis) [http://shlk.com/164], the willow (salix) [http://www.tau.ac.il/lifesci/botany/judaism.htm] and the date palm (phoenix dactylifera) [http://shlk.com/165].

One of the fiercest debates during Sukkot rages between people who argue over how to keep their lulav, willow and myrtle branches from drying up. The EtrogCenter site has this advice: keep the lulav in a cool and dry place. Wrap the myrtle and willow branches in damp paper towels. And do not refrigerate your etrog [http://www.etrogcenter.com/Instructions.htm].

Next week, what to do with your lulav and etrog after the holiday ends – and some tasty suggestions for Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

Toronto lawyer pleased by immigration changes

Saudis now required to obtain visas

Sergio Karas

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I feel vindicated," exulted Sergio Karas. "The right thing has been done."

Karas, a Toronto immigration lawyer, was in a good mood last week after learning that the Canadian government had finally acted on his recommendation.

On Sept. 5, nearly a year after Saudi and Egyptian hijackers attacked the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., Immigration Minister Denis Coderre announced that citizens of Saudi Arabia would henceforth be required to obtain temporary resident visas to enter Canada.

Saudis had been exempt from this provision.

In letters to Coderre, one of his senior officials and Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, Karas fought a lonely battle to persuade Canada to lift the visa exemption Saudis enjoyed when entering Canada.

Karas warned them that the policy was a serious threat to Canada's national security and posed a danger to Canadian Jews as well.

Neither Coderre nor one of his officials, Johanne Deslauriers, answered his letters.

Graham's department, however, acknowledged his letter and passed it on to Coderre.

Karas also wrote to Paul Cellucci, the U.S. ambassador to Canada.

In response, the minister counsellor in the American embassy wrote that his letter "addresses a very real concern," and assured him that the matter was under discussion with Canadian authorities.

In announcing his decision, Coderre said the exemption on Saudi residents was cancelled because, after Sept. 11, Saudi passports are "vulnerable to abuse."

"The decision to lift the visa exemption was not made lightly nor in isolation," Coderre explained.

"Several factors were considered as we sought an appropriate balance between facilitating the entry of legitimate travellers and protecting the integrity of Canada's immigration program."

In his appeal to the federal government, Karas, an immigrant from Argentina, called Canada's policy dangerous.

As he put it: "The Jewish community should be extremely concerned about this policy. It is amazing that Saudis should be treated on the same level as the United States, Britain and Europeans. After 9/11, it makes no sense whatsoever."

Karas argued that the Saudi goverment did not accord visa-free entry to Canadians, restricted travel by foreigners and required disclosure of religion in visa applications.

After learning that Canada had followed his recommendation, Karas declared, "Finally, the government of Canada has done the right thing. But it took Canada one year to act."

Karas expressed regret that not a single Jewish member of Parliament took an interest in his cause.

And he voiced sadness that Jewish organizations offered no help.

"I did this all by myself," he said. "The bureaucrats of Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation did nothing."

Karas said he wanted to thank the U.S. embassy for correctly sizing up the problem.

"I'm sure the United States leaned very hard on Canada when they realized what I was saying."

Karas' work is far from finished.

He wants Canada to lift the visa exemption citizens of Malaysia currently enjoy.

"Malaysia is a place where Islamic militants live."

TJFLC hosting Hebrew Free Loan conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa is the best kept secret in town, according to Jerry Blitzer, one of the organization's core volunteers.

Operating out of a modest office in the Lipa Green Building, the Cassa – or "bank" in Polish – circulates $1.79 million in interest-free loans to immigrants, post-secondary students and other community members who are starting a business or who need the money for educational or personal reasons.

Blitzer, along with Brahm Seitz, TJFLC president; Cathie Smith-Friedman, immediate past president; and Marlee Allen Petroff, the organization's outreach co-ordinator and one of four mostly part-time staff members, met with The CJN to shed light on what the Cassa does and to talk about the International Association of Hebrew Free Loans' 21st annual conference that it is hosting Oct. 6-8 in Toronto.

Blitzer, who became involved with the organization 12 years ago at age 61, is the Cassa's chair, special events – the point man for the conference and an Oct. 6 dinner honouring Cassa volunteers Bert Cohen, Harold Hertzman and Jack Schwartz.

Although the TJFLC in its present form dates only to the 1980s, it was formed from the merger of three older organizations: the Toronto Hebrew Re-establishment Services Gemilath Chasadim (established in 1924), Scholarship and Aid, and the Loan Cassa, an agency set up to lend money to Jewish immigrants who wanted to start farms in Canada.

Twenty-five years ago, recalled Seitz, new immigrant loans were geared to starting businesses, not farms. At that time, he was a 25-year-old new loan committee volunteer who he had just moved from Montreal and wanted to get involved in the community.

The work has proved rewarding. "It's very hands-on. You meet the people you're helping, which is a good feeling. You see the results. You see someone come to borrow money because they just got into the country, and they borrow a few dollars to get into an apartment. You see them a year later when they're taking a course to return to their profession, and you see them two years after that because they want to start a business. And all of a sudden you see them as a donor or a volunteer."

He estimates that four or five of the current volunteers have been borrowers.

Wherever there are Jewish communities, there are free loan societies, said Seitz. The societies originated in Poland more than 200 years ago, added Blitzer.

Funding for the Toronto Cassa is derived from the original fund as well as through memberships, donations and bequests. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the United Way provide operating expenses.

The loan Cassa of today will lend up to $10,000 to help start a business and $3,600 for student or personal loans. Applicants need three guarantors, and can repay 4 per cent a month, interest-free, over two and a half years.

Volunteers interview applicants one-on-one and present their cases to the rest of the loan committee to be voted on the same day. Although the business loan committee holds interviews on weekday mornings, businesspeople as well as retirees make time to volunteer for the monthly meetings, said Smith-Friedman, a 41-year-old social worker.

Including the interviews for personal and student loans, which are held every other week, there are more than 500 interviews a year. Over 80 per cent of the applicants receive loans, said Seitz.

In the late 1970s, he recalls, Russian immigrants commonly borrowed money to pay shipping charges on items they had sent from home.

Loans also helped people purchase kitchenware and furniture for their new apartments. Sometimes, recalls Seitz, immigrants would ask for money for "furniture" when they really wanted a television set. "Our take was [that] you need the television set to learn the language."

Other personal loans have funded burials, medical needs not covered by OHIP and reunification with an ailing relative.

Sometimes, said Seitz, the committee has to turn people away, but never because of a lack of funds.

One early borrower was theatre impresario and Honest Ed's owner Ed Mirvish who wrote a testimonial letter in anticipation of the upcoming conference.

Although the 47 member organizations of the international organizations differ in size and community demographics, issues such as fundraising, collection of repayments, new areas of funding and assessing need are common issues that will be addressed at the conference.

Deadline approaching for Israel Advocacy funding

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UIA Federations Canada, which funds a number of Canada-wide agencies including National Jewish Campus Services, has allocated $100,000 to fund innovative Israel advocacy programming on campuses excluding Montreal and Toronto for the 2002-2003 school year. (Campuses in those two cities receive funding from their local federations.)

"We wanted to do something significant," said Lance Davis, UIAFC's director of leadership development.

"Students living on campus in particular have to deal with anti-Israel and anti-Zionist propaganda, sentiment and rhetoric, and that tension fills the air 24 hours a day, seven days a week. They face a greater challenge than the average person in the community.

"The message we heard from students and lay leaders," said Davis, "was that things would be more effective if they were done locally."

The funding, which is a separate budget line not available last year, will not affect the amount campuses receive for other programming like Shabbat, arts or environmental events.

"We're giving campuses that are often underfunded a chance to raise the bar of programming by doing something extraordinary with funds that are not part of their annual allocation," said Davis.

"Working with students is probably one of the best investments we as a community can make," he added. "These are our future leaders."

Each campus with more than 250 Jewish students may apply for up to $10,000. Joint applications from schools with smaller Jewish populations are also eligible. Applications must be submitted on line, by Sept. 30.

There's no formula for the programs, said Davis, but "creativity is probably the cornerstone." Programs must be initiated and developed by students, and must be supported by their campus professional.

> 'These are our future leaders'

Applications will be judged by a committee of three community lay leaders and two students.

Anyone who submits a grant proposal will be invited to a Canada Israel Experience training conference for Birthright madrichim (leaders) being held in Collingwood, Ont., in October. Funding for travel will be available.

The goal of the conference, said Adam Minsky, director of national campus services, is to provide Israel advocacy training and, for those who have submitted grant applications, to "refine the grants, enrich their proposals, and provide them with additional services."

At the same time, he hopes that the professionals at the conference will learn what grant applicants see as the most effective tools and services to help the campus community.

"We're dealing with [students,] the most creative population. I'm confident we're going to come up with some outstanding ideas," said Davis.

For further information about the Israel Advocacy grants, go to www.younglead ershipcanada.org under Grant Application, or to www.jewishcanada.org and see the top right corner.

Quebec scholar decries academic boycott of Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – As Israel became increasingly targeted by academic boycotts over the past six months, one of the first non-Jewish scholarly voices in Canada to denounce the practice was Annette Paquot.

During the summer, Paquot, who heads the linguistics and translation department at Laval University, decried what she saw as an alarming and outrageous effort to stifle academic freedom.

And, as she said during a recent telephone interview, "I have been one of the few willing to do it publicly."

Paquot was angered by the "appalling" academic boycott launched last April in a petition published as a letter to The Guardian newspaper in Britain.

In the petition – started by British professor Steven Rose, a Jew who has renounced his right of return to Israel over its treatment of the Palestinians – more than 100 academics criticized Israel for its "campaign against the Palestinian people" and called for an academic boycott of both scientific conferences in Israel and of scientific and cultural exchanges.

The number of signatories to the petition has since mushroomed into several hundred.

About one month after the campaign was launched, two Israeli scholars were fired from the boards of two academic translation journals owned by Mona Baker, a professor at the University of Manchester Institute of Technology, who said she was honouring the boycott of Israeli institutions.

One of the fired academics, Miriam Shlesinger of Bar-Ilan University, said she and Gideon Toury of Tel Aviv University were dismissed because they had "the wrong passports."

Paquot sees such initiatives as a threat to academic freedom and human rights.

In an opinion piece published in Le Devoir, Paquot said the boycott and firings raise serious questions that transcend academia.

"The two Israelis earned their positions on the journals based on their professional and scientific reputations," Paquot wrote. "How can it possibly be justified that they were fired because of their citizenship?...

"Will being part of a particular national group become a criterion for competence?"

Paquot wondered why Israel been singled out for an academic boycott.

"The implacable harshness against the Jewish State, this selective indignation, this imbalance of blame, should make people within certain intellectual circles honestly ask themselves about the current tendency to demonize Israel."

What particularly outraged Paquot, she told The CJN, was the "indifference" of many of her colleagues toward efforts to ostracize Israel through boycotts.

Besides the pro-Palestinian bias within academia, Paquot suspected an element of "hidden anti-Semitism," despite the indignant protestations to the contrary by those in support of the campaign.

In late July, the Society for Academic Freedom and Scholarship (SAFS), based in London, Ont., joined Paquot in condemning the boycott, stating that any such effort "weakens science, impeded the progress of scholarship, and denies full opportunities to Jewish and Arab students in Israeli universities."

The SAFS stated that the signatories to the petition "fail to distinguish between the individual and the nation."

In blunt terms, the SAFS called "any such actions contemptible, political attacks that violate academic freedom, diminish the dignity of the individual, and debase the scholarly process.

"Academic freedom means the right to engage in free inquiry – to research, teach, and otherwise communicate without regard to prevailing doctrine.

"To deny academics participation in normal activities of scholarship, simply because they work in Israel, is to deprive them of their academic freedom."

Harvey Shulman, a member of the SAFS board of directors who teaches at Concordia University, said the reaction by Canadian academia to the boycott has been "tepid, hesitant and too ambiguous."

He said that at Concordia, the boycott did not appear to be an issue for most of his colleagues.

Ottawa doctor honoured for helping doctors

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Dr. Rose Goldstein, a rheumatologist, is well known for helping patients, but she has recently been recognized for her assistance to fellow physicians as well.

At a special ceremony held during the Canadian Medical Association's annual meeting in Saint John, N.B., Goldstein, also associate dean of professional affairs at the faculty of medicine at the University of Ottawa, became the first recipient of the May Cohen Award for Women Mentors.

The award recognizes a woman physician who has demonstrated outstanding mentoring abilities.

Cohen was a family doctor in Hamilton, and until her retirement a few years ago, director of the women's health office at McMaster University medical school.

Goldstein, a native of Montreal and graduate of McGill University, became interested in mentoring, "because I saw the difference that it made to my career and I saw people around me, particularly women, who did not have that advantage.

"When the faculty of medicine established the Office of Gender Equity, one of the mandates was to mentor women and improve their role in the faculty of medicine."

Through her work with the Office of Gender Equity, Goldstein has helped to define an equitable promotion policy, and has inspired similar initiatives in other Ontario universities.

She has initiated and leads workshops on leadership development, balancing professional and family life and the academic promotion process and has provided conflict resolution training.

She also mentors other mentors.

"A lot of my mentoring is informal. I have helped others to counsel women about academic promotion, helping them through the process in almost a coaching role."

The award came as a great surprise to her, she said.

"There were no awards for such things when I began. The role is rather new, and until now has not been recognized. It is especially meaningful because I know May Cohen. She has been an important influence in the area of women in medicine and women's health, and she was one of my mentors.

"Through her tireless activities and advocacy on behalf of others, she embodies mentoring, and laid the ground work for establishing mentoring as an important professional activity," said Goldstein.

תכלה שנה

או טו טו לקראת שנה חדשה את מקומה של אחת השנים הקשות והאיומות ביותר בישראל. הטרור, הכלכלה, האנטישמיות האירופאית, הבדידות בעולם. אבל דווקא עכשיו מבצבצים כמה ניצנים מעודדים. יש ראיות ראשוניות לכך שהכלכלה הישראלית מתחילה להתאושש ועובדת לגידול, ובמישור הפלשתינאי נראה שצה"ל והשב"כ מתחילים למצוא תשובות, גם אם לא מלאות, לטרור. נדמה גם, חלושה ולא אחידה, שהפלשתינאים מתחילים לחבץ שחטרור הולך לשבור אותם, ואין סיכוי שישבור את ישראל. הסטטיסטיקה מראה ירידה דראמאטית במספר חטפים לישראל: אין כמעט תיירות, וגם תכניות חינוכיות רבות מתבטלות. רוב היחודים, כמו חגורים, פוחדים. יחידים שממשיכים למלא מטוסים הם הישראלים. וזהי השעה חיפה שלנו: תמשיכו לנסוע, לבקר, להביא מתנות, לארח ישראלים כאן. זה חבית שלנו. אלה מיכם שמגלגלים עיניים ואומרים "כולם שם אומרים לי לא לבוא עכשיו"-זה לאק, זה קשקוש- שם יהיאים, מבלים, חוגגים. תסעו ותחזרו מחוקים.

תאימחות

אחד הקטעים הכי קשים בשבילי השנה היה סראות הטלביזיה וחעיתונות של אימחות פלשתינאית שמעודדת את ילדיהן לחיות שאחידים. קשה לי לחשוב על משהו יחתר מפלצתי מזה. נדמה לי גם שזה שכנע גיים רבים לראות את האכזריות והזוסר האנושיות של חמאבק חפלשתינאי. זה חחבדל ותחומי בין ח-אידישע מאמע לבין ח-שאואידישע מאמע. אבל שישאר ביניכו.

על הסיגנון

בערך אחת לשנה מתלוצן אחד מחקוראים לערך חעיתון על סיגנון הכתיבה שלי. בפעם האחרונה זה היה קשור לטעם שלי בבדיחות. חפעם ותלוצנו י.ו-ז.פ (בחרתי בילחם שם מאחר וחמכתב לא נשלח אלי אלא לעיתון) אני מתרגם קטע ממכתבם לערך:

"וחדעתנו מגטייחו בסנן וחאחרון לחשתמש בשפה פוגעת. למשל כשאחר באחנו נחרף "חקבדים בטפשותם", או כשכינח את חאירופאיי "כלביס" בגלל חצחרות אנטי ישראליות של פרופסורים אירופאיים". רק בשביל חחקשה כיניתי את חקבדים טפשים כשבמבע שחסרט "חתנח מאחרת" מתרחש בגרמניה, בעוד שחסרט מתרחש בישראל זה מייצג עבורי סוג של שטחיות וחפיפיות שאופייני לתרבות חזו. לאירופאיים וחאנטישמיים קראתי כלבים, כי מתוך ניסוח אינני יכול להעלות על חמכתב על אח מה שאני באמת מרגיש. זה ש-י.ו.פ מאמינים שחעצמות וחאירופאיות וץ "אנטי ישראליות" ולא "אנטישמיות" זה סיפור עצב לכשעצמו.

"שישאר ביניכו" הוא טוי שכמבע בעברית לישראלים. לא חייתי כותב כך באנגלית, זה אולי ייחודי של חטוי בעולם שיש בו מספיק טוויים שחם פוליטיקאלי קוקטיים. אינני מתכוון להעליב בכתיבתי את י.ו.פ או אף אחד אחר. אבל לא יקראו לחם כלום אם יזליטו לקראת חשנה לדבר. תרי לא צריך לקריאה את כל מה שכתוב בעיתון.

החשוואה השבועית

מי מיכם שקורא עיתונים ישראליים לא יכול להתעלם מחיעסוק חכפייתי בחשוואה בין ישראל לשאר חעולם. כאילו כל חחיים שם חם לינה אחת ומחמשכת מלידה ועד מוחו. וחיזה בבחוף אחד של "ידיעות אחרונות" מרגיעים שחישראלי חממוצע מתנסח בחיינ עם כך וכך נשים בכך וכך נצחוחו, שזה חמקום חשבעה עשר בעולם בתנחות ומקום עשרים ושבעה בממוצע חשבועי. וחתלמיד חישראלי, שחיה עד לא מכבר במקום חראשון בעולם בסחיטקה ירד למקום חעשרים ושמח חמביש. ומסקר חשבוע- רמת חשחיסוה חציבורית. ולא חייתי מטריד אחכם בנושא שנגמי כל כך, אלמלא חחיכרח שם קנדה ביש גלי. בכתבה וחראיין "איש חעסקים חבינלאומי ע"ד נדען פישר שמאוכזב מן חמיקום חמנוך של ישראל. וכך וזה מצחיק:

"קח למשל את קנדה. מדינה שנחשבת נקיית כפיים, אבל בפועל, בכל חרשויות חמקומיות שלה יש חעשייה מאכערים מפוחחת, ששום עסק גדול לא יכול לזוז בלעדיה. חייתי חמום כשנתקלתי בזה, חעשייתי פטריוט לגבי חמנהל וחתקין בישראל".

חשבתי לעצמי: מסכים וקנדיים- אין בקנדה פרוטקציה כמו בישראל, או צריך לשלם למעכאים..... אבל שישאר ביניכו.

שנחיה שנה טובה, בריאה ושקטה.

Coast to Coast

Jumping aboard a rickety bandwagon

How has it come to this? At the same time as a growing number of Palestinian intellectuals and even political figures are opposing violence and terrorism against Israelis as both counterproductive to Palestinian interests and inherently wrong, numerous western intellectuals are busy advancing the opposite argument.

They insist, contrary to the facts and to valid moral principles, that Palestinian terrorism is an understandable and justifiable "resistance to occupation." Their argument, it must be said bluntly, amounts to rank stupidity. While this column recently addressed the subject, warning about the "suicide-bombing-is-justified-resistance" bandwagon, we must revisit it now that another prominent figure has just jumped aboard in a most troubling way.

Ted Honderich, a former Canadian, a recently retired professor of philosophy in Britain and author of the just-published book After the Terror, was the subject of a feature interview on CBC Radio's This Morning, Sunday Edition with host Michael Enright. (The Sept. 8 program was devoted, as all such programs were last week, to retrospectives on Sept. 11.) Toward the end of the first chapter in After the Terror, Honderich singles out Israel and its alliance with the United States for special historical attention, because, as he writes, "wrongly or rightly," it is "the outstanding cause of the terrorism that seized our concentration on Sept.11 and subsequently gave rise to our counter-attack on Islamic terror." You know where this is going.

His historical treatment is tremendously skewed, making a mockery of his claim that he's limiting himself "to propositions that seem more or less indisputable."

The same distorting lens soon becomes apparent in the interview. While Enright lists Honderich's impressive credentials, he omits to inform listeners that Honderich is one of the supporters of the European academic boycott of Israel.

Honderich contrasts the Sept. 11 terrorists whose acts were "monstrous," "hideous," and "entirely wrong" with Palestinians who have "a moral right to their terrorism." After all, claims Honderich, drawing upon what he calls a "literal metaphor," the Palestinians have suffered and continue to suffer a "rape of Palestine by Israel." Insisting that Israel claims a "moral right to its state terrorism," Honderich finds further justification for Palestinian terrorism on that (non-existent) basis. And he concludes that in supporting Israel, in underwriting, in effect, its "rape" of Palestine, the United States bears "a responsibility for Sept. 11."

That Honderich promotes Israel as the central causal factor in Sept. 11, when Osama bin Laden himself has placed the Palestinian cause far down on his list of grievances against the West, clearly reveals a peculiar obsession on Honderich's part.

The mind reels at the accumulation of factual and moral absurdities in the first chapter of Honderich's book and in 25 minutes of thoroughly unchallenged conversation. (Space does not allow for rebuttal. See the Aug. 29 column at www.cicweb.ca under "According to Reports" for generic responses.)

We are in a very precarious place these days – intellectually, morally, spiritually – when relatively accomplished contemporary philosophical figures like Honderich are looked to for moral guidance on issues about which they spew nonsense. And not just any nonsense, but dangerous nonsense (rationalizing the murder of innocents) that is met with the most uncritical acceptance on our trusted public broadcaster. Shameful.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Open Letter to the Community

The volunteer committee of B & G Productions would like to extend its sincere thanks to all those who helped support our charity fundraising event on July 13th 2001. The event was held at The Revival Lounge and attracted over 400 participants to a night of great music, dancing and socializing. We would also like to thank our corporate sponsors: Crane Capital, Cantar/Polyair, BellePak, Forum Financial, Dominion Sheet Metal and Roofing, City Water Inc, and Passion Group.

We are pleased to report that all the funds were directed to V'Ahavta, The Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian Relief Committee (original Charity of Record was Zareinu). It is encouraging and gratifying to know that with a little effort we can do a lot of good for people in need ... and have fun doing it.

Bibi gives defiant speech

Violent pro-Palestinian protesters in Montreal prevented Netanyahu from delivering a speech at Concordia University.

In Ottawa, where he met with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, demonstrators milled around the downtown hotel where he spoke.

At the Toronto Centre for the Arts, some 200 Palestinians and their sympathizers, waving Palestinian flags and shouting slogans, confronted an almost equally large phalanx of Israel supporters holding aloft Israeli flags and placards.

Armed police officers kept the antagonistic groups apart, and there was no violence.

In a biting reference to the pro-Palestinian protesters, Netanyahu said that Israel provokes Palestinians by its mere existence.

"What you saw in Montreal is a microcosm of the hatred we're fighting," he said, apparently referring to the current Palestinian uprising.

Netanyahu, the author of a book on terrorism, branded terrorism " a criminal means of warfare" that must always be rejected and punished.

Defining terrorism as the systematic attack against civilians, he charged Palestinians with deliberately targeting Israelis.

"Terrorists trample all human rights into the dust," he declared.

Characterizing the events of Sept. 11 as "a wakeup call from hell," Netanyahu launched into a blistering critique of Arafat.

Having earlier accused him of naming public squares after known terrorists, Netanyahu claimed that Arafat does not seek peace, but Israel's destruction.

He ascribed Israel's presence in the West Bank, and the formation of the Palestinian refugee problem, to "Arab aggression."

Presenting a short history of Zionist settlement in Palestine, Netanyahu urged the world to understand "basic historical truths" about the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Jews did not steal Palestinian lands, he said emphatically.

"We never gave up our claim to the land as a free and independent people."

Growing still more emotional, he added, "We're not in a strange land. We're in our land."

Netanyahu said that an Arab propaganda campaign has succeeded in clouding the issue of land ownership.

Asserting that Israel and Diaspora Jews must work hand in hand to defeat the false perception that the foundations of Israel were laid on Palestinian territory, Netanyahu said, "This is the most important battle we face."

Ramming home his point, he observed: "The most important battle we're fighting is the battle for the truth."

After describing a meeting he once had with the late Lubavitch Rebbe in New York City, Netanyahu said he has devoted himself to lighting the candles of truth so as to dispel the slanders and vilification hurled against Israel.

In closing, he urged members of the audience to become "soldiers of truth."

Several speakers preceded Netanyahu, notably Meir Romem, Israel's consul general in Toronto, and Israel Asper, the Winnipeg-based proprietor of the Canwest Global media empire, which includes Global Television and the National Post.

Romem said Israel is at war and that the objective of the Palestinians is to destroy the Jewish state.

Saying that Israel's spirit has not been broken by the latest intifadah, Romem stated that Israel will stand firm and win.

He asked Jews to show solidarity with Israel by visiting the country, by investing in it and by buying its products.

Asper said that anti-Semitism rises when Israel is attacked and defends itself.

Criticism of Israel veers into sheer anti-Semitism, he continued, when it denigrates Zionism in contemptuous terms.

He called on Jews to respond vigorously to anti-Israel bashing before it assumes crisis proportions.

Sitting on the front line at Concordia University

By SHIRA GOLDBERG

In the CJN's Rosh Hashanah supplement for 5763, there is an image of a group of Canadian youths, clad in army khaki, on a volunteer mission to Israel last May. There I am, sitting in the front line.

Now it's Sept. 9 in Montreal, and I have decided to attend a lecture by former Israeli Prime Minister Benyamin Netanyahu scheduled at Concordia University. The subject is combating terrorism.

Guest Voice

Concern about terrorism abounds in Israel, but not in Montreal. I was unprepared for the intensity of the confrontation that erupted before my eyes.

As soon as I approached the pulsating campus, I began to feel uneasy. An angry mob of students waving Palestinian flags had circumvented the police barriers meant to confine the protest group. The Jewish girl who was accompanying me decided to return home. Determined to gain entry, with my tickets in hand, I finally advanced to the front of the line.

Once past the extensive security at the building's lobby, I came face-to-face with a group of protestors being held back by police on the second floor balcony. One man caught my eye, glared at me and pointed at me menacingly. For the first time in my sheltered existence, I felt threatened as a Jew. At no point during my time in Israel had I felt so intimidated.

But I escaped the commotion; a lady ushered me into the lecture hall. Immediately, I felt the calm in the room, which was now almost full. Then police entered with dogs to sniff for explosives. Soon an announcement was made that the lecture would proceed when security improved. Everyone waited patiently, talking quietly.

When the spokesman returned, he said the police had determined it was not safe for Netanyahu to speak at this lecture hall that day. He added that it was not safe for those in the hall to leave, saying that tear gas was being used outside to disperse the crowd.

The audience responded loudly and emotionally. Several students shouted, interrupting the subsequent speakers who tried to explain the situation. Several people tried to leave the room but security officers prevented them. We were required to wait it out, in this shelter. Some people began singing Israeli songs, but it didn't catch on. Speakers were ignored. People tried to cope with the frustration of their confinement and the cancellation of the lecture.

Finally, after more than two hours, we were evacuated in groups of 20 at a time. This exemplary composure, in opposition to the chaotic violence on the street, was a contrast as sharp as the shards of broken glass that lay at our feet when we left the building.

Once outside, I thought about the people who are scared to travel to Israel right now. Likewise, many were reluctant to hear Netanyahu at Concordia. The sad truth is that the problem of terrorism is everywhere. Like the spray used to dissolve the fanatical mob, the crisis permeates every domain – even an academic institution dedicated to preserving freedom of thought and expression. We must deal with it in all places.

When I returned to my apartment, I recounted the day's horrifying events to my non-Jewish roommate and her close friend, who told me that she had been invited by her social activism group to attend a "peaceful information session" about Palestinian rights. She had considered attending the rally and was shocked to learn about the violence that had ensued.

By manipulating language, extremists have been able to convince many Canadians that the Palestinians are the sole victims in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. They are taking advantage of the tolerance and political correctness that characterizes Canada, particularly in its highest institutions of learning. Radical students, who hector for freedom of speech when it suits their interests, attempted to silence another's voice.

No longer can we sit by idly and unsuspecting. It is time to renew the fight against terror. In this important battle, we must all push to the front of the line.

Concordia's response to violent protest criticized

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The suspension of Mideast-related events by Concordia University after violent protests forced the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu penalizes Jewish students who want to stage pro-Israel activities, an organizer of the event says.

"Concordia deserves a lot of credit for its willingness to host [Netanyahu], but it has made a mistake. A moral equivalency is being drawn which is inappropriate," Rabbi Reuben Poupko said.

"What Concordia should be doing is shutting down Arab or Palestinian activism, and the Jewish students should be rewarded with additional platforms."

Yoni Petel, president of Montreal Hillel, which sponsored Netanyahu's Sept. 9 appearance, said he understands the need for a cooling-off period, but feels the moratorium gives the protesters what they wanted.

"It's infringing on the rights of everyone. The rioters have managed to take away the freedom of not only the pro-Israel camp, but also the moderate Arab camp."

The night after the violence, in which protesters smashed glass windows of the downtown Henry F. Hall Building and threw chairs and other objects at police who responded with pepper spray and batons, Concordia rector Frederick Lowy announced a "period of restraint" that will last until further notice.

No university space may be used for speeches, rallies, exhibits or information tables on the Mideast conflict. The administration will meet with student leaders to develop a "long-term policy" on such activities, Lowy said.

The day after the protest, members of the Concordia Student Union (CSU) executive denounced the moratorium at a press conference and called on Lowy to resign if he could not guarantee freedom of speech and the right to dissent on campus for all students.

One of the moratorium's first casualties, the Montreal Gazette reported, was a lecture on the Mideast situation by U.S. academic Norman Finkelstein, a well-known anti-Zionist. Scheduled for last Thursday by the CSU, it was to have been replaced by a forum led by Lowy and CSU president Sabine Friesinger on free speech, tolerance and diversity.

Lowy called the protest, whose organizers made it known well in advance that their goal was to stop Netanyahu from coming on campus, "a shameful and distressing event."

Besides the damage to property, Lowy deplored the "intimidation" and "jostling" of some students and visitors as they entered the Hall building to go to the main hall were Netanyahu was to speak.

Lowy promised to prosecute those who provoked or engaged in violence or vandalism, and to have their student status reviewed. Police have already charged five people.

The day before Netanyahu's Montreal appearance, about 250 people protested peacefully outside the venue where he spoke in Winnipeg. Protests were similarly peaceful the following day in both Ottawa and Toronto.

The Montreal protest was officially organized by the Quebec Coalition for a Just Peace in the Middle East, which considers Netanyahu a war criminal. Though largely made up of Arab students, one of the group's key organizers, Aaron Maté, is Jewish. Maté, who is also a CSU vice-president, was among those arrested.

Petel said Hillel is compiling its own evidence for police of the "hundreds" of people who were "heckled, spat upon, kicked and shoved" as they went into the Hall building.

Among those attacked was 73-year-old Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, an event co-sponsor.

"This is Europe 1939 all over again," said the Czech-born Hecht. "I was kicked, spat upon, told this is not your country, it's a Palestinian checkpoint. I was found guilty just because I had come to hear [Netanyahu]. This is fascism; it's not civil behaviour," he said.

Rabbi Poupko and Petel are seeking a review of what they feel was a failure by the police and university security to contain demonstrators. They believe it was particularly egregious that 200 protesters made it inside the building, stationing themselves on the escalators and mezzanine beside the hall where the event was.

"There was even one demonstrator standing on a police car shouting his hatred, and the police did nothing," said Petel, who said he did not regret bringing Netanyahu to Concordia.

Concordia professor Frederick Krantz said police "generally stood by" as people "ran the gauntlet" to enter. He said Concordia should set up a "blue-ribbon" panel to examine how the university handled this "debacle."

Demonstrators began congregating on the street at 9:30 a.m. for Netanyahu's noon-hour speech and by 10:30 there were about 350 of them, but the atmosphere appeared calm as protesters chanted slogans and held Palestinian flags.

By 11 a.m., those with tickets were allowed past tight security and into the building. But when the hall was only half-full, Lowy announced that a demonstration outside had grown out of control.

Netanyahu never left the Ritz Carlton Hotel four blocks away. Shortly after 1 p.m., one hour after the speech was to begin, Lowy announced to the 650-member capacity audience that the Montreal police, RCMP and Netanyahu's security personnel had decided it was "not advisable" for him to come to the campus.

At that point, police were confronting demonstrators inside the building and right outside the hall where Netanyahu was to speak.

Lowy said it was not the administration that had cancelled the event. In a later press release, the university said the decision was made when police felt they could not guarantee the security of the audience or anyone else in the building.

(Later that day, Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay issued a statement that Concordia made the decision to cancel when it deemed Netanyahu's security would be in jeopardy.)

Lowy, nevertheless, was heckled and shouted down by the disappointed audience. One young man in a kippah urged everyone to go outside the hall and take on the protesters.

Petel and Concordia Hillel president Patrick Amar pleaded with the audience to "keep your heads, unlike those outside," and "make Bibi proud." Amar called the demonstration a "viper's nest of anti-Semitism."

Most then stood up and sang Hatikvah. The audience spent almost another hour inside the hall until police gave permission to leave.

At a press conference later, Netanyahu said he was "glad" his appearance had been called off, because it gave Canadians a glimpse of the "mad zealotry run amok" that Israel must contend with.

"What you saw is a small example of what the larger war on terrorism is about," he said. "These people hate the freedoms we cherish and seek to extinguish them anyway they can." He compared the protesters to those who cheered when the World Trade Center towers crumbled.

"This was not a demonstration, which is a part of democracy. What we had was a coercive riot to prevent the airing of the truth."

Netanyahu said those who had tried to stifle him had failed "because instead of speaking to 600 people, I can speak through you [the media] to 30 million people." He insisted that he had been prepared "until the last moment" to speak. He said he would accept another invitation to speak at Concordia if it was made.

Netanyahu firmly rejected a suggestion that inviting him to Concordia was "waving a red flag" given the history of tensions at the university over the Middle East.

"The cause of the problem is the rioters who want to prevent basic rights... If there is a situation at Concordia, clean it up... It's unacceptable to have a hornets' nest in the halls of academia, which is supposed to be a place of open debate." With files from JTA.

Israel pleased with Bush's UN speech, but keeps quiet

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Officials in Israel's security establishment expressed satisfaction with U.S. President George Bush's speech to the United Nations General Assembly last week, when he said that if Iraq does not comply with UN resolutions, action against Baghdad would be "unavoidable."

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is said to be refraining from responding publicly to the speech for fear it might undermine U.S. efforts to garner international support – particularly among Arab countries – for military action.

In internal discussions held last Thursday, Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer responded favourably to Bush's address, since he believes Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein poses a threat to the entire region.

Defence sources say the United States will now focus on mobilizing international support for action against Iraq. But this has no meaning from an operational standpoint, since Bush hinted in his speech the United States would act alone if necessary.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who was at the UN to hear the address, called it unequivocal, determined and powerful, saying it clearly stressed the necessity to continue the global fight against terror. He said U.S. efforts to "save freedom" in two world wars means it has a right to expect the world to understand its position on Iraq.

"[Bush] left the door open for another attempt [at Iraqi disarmament] through the [UN] Security Council, though I must admit the chances for it are very dim," Peres said.

If Saddam defies the international community again, the world must move "deliberately and decisively" against him, Bush told the General Assembly.

Bush's speech amounted to a challenge to the UN to live up to its responsibilities. "Iraq has answered a decade of UN demands with a decade of defiance," he said, adding the UN now faces "a difficult and defining moment. Are Security Council resolutions to be honoured and enforced… or cast aside without consequence? Will the United Nations serve the purpose of its founding… or will it be irrelevant?"

Bush offered to work with other nations on a resolution "to meet our common challenge." His apparent willingness to act through the UN seemed to respond to a growing chorus against unilateral U.S. action to topple Saddam.

A senior U.S. official said U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell would be working with the four other permanent Security Council members – Russia, China, France and Britain – on a deadline for Iraq to comply with demands to admit weapons inspectors.

Bush laid out a harsh indictment of Saddam and challenged the UN, which included many skeptical member nations, to act swiftly on a new Iraq resolution. "The Security Council resolutions will be enforced – the just demands of peace and security will be met – or action will be unavoidable," he said.

He left little doubt the United States would respond on its own if necessary. "If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will immediately end all support for terrorism and act to suppress it, as all states are required to do by UN Security Council resolutions," Bush said.

In response, British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said he has always believed the Iraq issue should be dealt with at the UN "because it is the UN's authority that has been consistently flouted."

Iraq's UN ambassador Mohammed Aldouri called Bush's speech the "longest series of fabrications that has ever been told by a leader of a nation" and an attempt to divert attention from the Israeli-Palestinian crisis. He said the United States has failed to find evidence of Iraq's involvement in terrorism.

Meanwhile, Israeli defence sources said Iraq has stepped up attempts to move weapons and financial aid to the Palestinian areas in order to resume terror attacks against Israel. Iraq's plan is to refocus international attention on the Israeli-Arab conflict and hope for a second front in case of a U.S. attack against Baghdad.

The Iraqi-backed Arab Liberation Front last week held a rally in Gaza where financial grants from Saddam were handed out to 32 families of Palestinian dead. The rally included an appearance by Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, who called for "unity in the ranks of the resistance," and linked Palestinian resistance to Israeli occupation and U.S. threats to Iraq.

Argentina's Jews fight poverty

By VIVIANA GORDON

Commentary

A hundred years ago, many Jews came to Argentina escaping persecution in their homelands and searching for better opportunities in a country full of promises. Today, those dreams are shattered because of the crisis that has stricken this land. Once the fourth wealthiest economy in the world, Argentina has fallen into a deep depression following a recession that began in 1998.

The crisis reached its climax last December when five presidents came to power in just a few weeks. Corruption is an omnipresent feature in every government.

Since then, Argentina has defaulted on its foreign debt and has no credit; access to savings accounts has been restricted. Moreover, the peso, linked to the U.S. dollar for the past decade, was devalued, and prices started to climb while incomes remained stable or decreased.

This past May, the unemployment rate reached a record 21.5 per cent, according to the National Institute of Statistics and Census (INDEC). But unofficial figures estimate that it might be as high as 35 per cent, a number which does not include the 15 per cent who work less than 10 hours a week. Almost 50 per cent of the population lives below the poverty line and 8,000 people cross that threshold every day.

Argentina's economic collapse has affected mainly its middle class, to which 80 per cent of the country's Jewish population belongs. Currently, there are about 200,000 Jews in Argentina, most of them in Buenos Aires. Seventy per cent of small businesses run by Jews were forced to close because of the situation.

Traditionally, Argentina's Jewish community has been well-organized, with more than 60 day schools and synagogues and a strong network of communal associations, supported mainly by the middle class. Today, over 20 schools have closed and attendance has dropped by 50 per cent because parents cannot afford to pay the tuition.

Many small businesses owners, merchants and professionals of the Argentinian Jewish community have lost their jobs and run out of money. Their savings have decreased dramatically with the recent banking restrictions adopted by the government.

Despite the fact that these figures are estimates because there is a lack of reliable data, a report done by the Fundación Tzedaka, the Jewish Argentine Community Foundation, estimates that 25 per cent of the Jewish community is poor and eight per cent is indigent. Indigents, those whose income does not allow them to obtain their basic food requirements, are the most needy.

Historically, poverty in Argentina has been represented by the structural poor – that is, large families lacking essential needs, such as basic education, a proper dwelling and food. However, the proportion of structurally poor Jews has always been very small. For the most part, poor Jews are part of the "new poor," as a result of a crisis that started in the 1970s and pushed thousands of middle class families below the poverty line due to a gradual salary drop. Between 1980 and 1990, the value of workers' income decreased by 40 per cent.

Nevertheless, the current economic depression has created a new group of impoverished Jews, called the "emergent poor," the formerly wealthy and upper class Jews who have become suddenly poor. Some people risk losing their homes because they cannot afford to pay the rent or the mortgage payments on time; others lack electricity and gas supplies. Many others face the impossibility of acquiring the drugs they need for their medical treatments.

As a result, within the impoverished Jewish community, there is increasing familial violence and break-up, school desertion, isolation and loss of community ties, as well as an increase in the mortality rate.

In 1998, there were 27,900 poor Jews – that is, 14 per cent of the Jewish population. By 2001, that figure increased to 38,800 (19 per cent), reaching 49,555 (25 per cent) this year. Within this category, the number of indigent poor rose from 6,200 (three per cent) in 1998 to 10,600 (five per cent) in 2001 to 15,097 (eight per cent) in 2002.

The current economic depression has created a new group of impoverished Jews called the 'emergent poor'

These numbers, however, mask a much harsher reality, one that cannot hide behind cold figures and is shown in the individual cases such as the ones referred to below.

Education: When a right becomes a luxury

Currently, more and more families are forced to withdraw their children from Jewish schools and send them to public ones. However, sometimes they cannot even afford that because they lack the money to pay for transportation.

Parents feel desperate when their children do not attend school, a fact that deepens their exclusion because the whole family is now isolated from the social groups they used to belong to.

The situation is critical at the university level as well. Even though university is public and free in Argentina, students can no longer support themselves financially.

Malnutrition: A common problem

A woman was worried because her husband was very sick with cancer and her house was mortgaged. Her family does not have enough money to buy milk for their baby and the public hospital stopped supplying them with it. She was so immersed in her despair she did not realize that her baby was undernourished.

When the risk of becoming homeless knocks at the door

Many members of the Jewish community face eviction and remain in the streets because they cannot financially support their homes or pay for the rent. One 55-year-old widow has spent her last savings paying the rent for the following year, managing to avoid eviction.

Nevertheless, she is unemployed and if she does not find a job, she will join the homeless in the near future. Her sons cannot help her, because one does not have a job and the other is still in high school.

When violence strikes

A man was robbed and murdered while he was working as a taxi driver. His wife and two sons lost most of their income. The youngest son is still in high school. The eldest, who used to drive the car at night, is no longer able to work because the car was confiscated during the murder investigation. Once a typical middle class family, they are now victims of the crisis and the violence prevailing in this land.

Due to the depth of the crisis, some Jews are considering leaving the country. The number of Jews immigrating to Israel has increased considerably this year. It is estimated that 5,000 to 6,000 people will make aliyah in 2002, compared to 1,500 in a typical year. Observers predict that around 20,000 might move to Israel in the next three years. Since the founding of the State of Israel, 65,000 Argentinian Jews have made aliyah.

These cases indicate just a few ways this depression is affecting Argentine Jews' everyday life. No one is free from falling into the seemingly never-ending spiral of despair and hopelessness. The Argentine government and political leaders do not seem ready to assume their responsibility and take measures to ease the suffering of the people, which is worsening constantly.

Even though local and international Jewish organizations are assisting Argentina's Jews through different projects, such as providing food, financial aid, job training and psychological support, among others, much more help is needed. The clock is ticking. Now is the time to act.

U.S. going it alone on terror, WJC chair says

TORONTO — The United States has never been as isolated on the world stage as it is now, says the chair of the New York-based World Jewish Congress.

Last Wednesday, on the first anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks, Israel Singer told a conference call of the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress that the United States finds itself alone in making a strong case against terrorism.

"We are more isolated than we've been in a very, very long time," Singer said. "We need to end our isolation. We need to change our situation. We cannot continue to remain as isolated as we are."

He said it's up to the United States to change its approach.

"The lack of empathy, the lack of understanding for other people's pain brought about by terror... the responsibility is ours. We have not explained efficiently or sufficiently to the world what the implications [of terror] are for each person.

"We have not made our case as Americans."

He said even traditional allies of the United States have fallen away from supporting an attack on Iraq, something Americans – especially Jews – should view with concern.

Sept. 9

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon appointed Maj.-Gen. Meir Dagan as director of the Mossad, replacing Ephraim Halevy, who has been appointed director of Israel's National Security Council.

Sept. 10

• Two new systems will be in place within a year to protect passenger planes over Israeli air space, Transportation Minister Ephraim Sneh said.

• Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti's deputy refused legal counsel at his trial. Nasser Awis, who faces murder charges relating to his alleged involvement in terrorism, said he did not recognize the court's authority.

Sept. 11

• The security cabinet voted to include Rachel's Tomb, near Bethlehem, on the Israeli side of a security fence. A day later, the Palestinian Authority called the move "a new crime against the Palestinian people, their Christian and Muslim holy places."

Sept. 12

• Four eastern Jerusalem Arabs were charged with involvement in terrorist attacks. The four, allegedly members of a Hamas cell, were accused of causing the deaths of 35 people.

Sept. 13

• Lebanon said plans to divert water from the Hatzbani springs would go ahead despite strong warnings from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon earlier this week. On Tuesday, Sharon warned Lebanon not to divert water from the springs, telling Army Radio that he sees the attempt to do so as "a pretext for war." Under a plan announced recently by Lebanon, a pipeline would take 5,000 cubic metres of drinking water each day to five or six villages on the banks of the Hatzbani River in south Lebanon.

Difficult questions lead Israelis to re-examine Russian aliyah

By JESSICA STEINBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A renewed call to change the Law of Return, which guarantees Israeli citizenship to anyone with at least one Jewish grandparent, is turning the spotlight on immigration from the former Soviet Union.

Nearly one million immigrants have moved to Israel from the former Soviet Union since the floodgates opened in the late 1980s – and as many as a quarter of them are not Jews according to religious law, experts say.

Though immigration has tailed off sharply in the last few years, the percentage of non-Jews among the most recent immigrants has risen as high as 70 per cent, Israel's chief rabbis say.

The Interior Ministry puts the figure slightly lower, at 58 per cent for the first half of 2002, but still far above what it was in previous years.

The controversy over Russian immigration is not academic. With Israel defining itself as the Jewish State – and with the Orthodox rabbinate in charge of marriage, divorce and burial – an influx of large numbers of non-Jews raises difficult societal questions.

Should non-Jewish immigrants be allowed to undergo Reform or Conservative conversion, for instance, or must they go the more demanding Orthodox route?

Indeed, some ask, should they have to convert at all? Or are the responsibilities of Israeli citizenship, such as military service, the price of entry to the Jewish people?

The significant number of non-Jewish immigrants has pushed these issues to the front of the political battlefield.

At the same time, Russian immigration has "forced Israeli society to find practical solutions for problems that didn't exist 10 years ago," says Eli Kazhdan, executive director of Yisrael b'Aliyah, Israel's largest Russian political party.

It has also infused the country with a fresh dose of Zionism at a time when patriotism has fallen prey to cynicism in much of Israeli society.

While most Israelis generally welcome the idea of immigration, opinions differ widely on the implications of the huge Russian immigration for the Jewish state. Recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union now make up nearly one-sixth of the population.

For the most part, it all can be traced back to the Law of Return, which begs the question of who is a Jew.

Initially adopted in 1950, the Law of Return gave every Jew the right to immigrate to Israel. An amendment in 1970 extended that right to non-Jews who had a Jewish parent or grandparent, their spouses and the spouses of Jews.

Of the 250,000 non-Jewish Russian immigrants, about 30,000 fall under the "grandfather clause." The rest are spouses or children of Jews.

Assuming half of those 250,000 are women of childbearing age, the figures mean that in coming generations, the Jewish State will be producing non-Jews, since halachah does not accept the children of non-Jewish mothers as Jews.

With only religious marriages recognized in Israel, the halachic issue raises dilemmas. How, for example, would a young man whose immigrant mother wasn't Jewish, but who served in the army and lives like any other secular Israeli, marry a woman who is accepted as Jewish?

Such questions, which threaten to create an "A-list" and "B-list" of halachic status, are a ticking time bomb in a country not lacking in explosive issues.

Some Israeli leaders, such as Interior Minister Eli Yishai of the Shas Party, and Chief Rabbis Yisrael Meir Lau and Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, want to eliminate the grandfather clause and limit the Law of Return to halachic Jews.

In July, the cabinet rejected a proposal to drop the grandfather clause – but the issue may come up again. Israel can't continue to bring entire Christian families to Israel, the chief rabbis said.

Without changes to the Law of Return, Yishai has warned, by 2010, Israel will lose its Jewish identity.

Others, such as the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), Sallai Meridor, are equally adamant that Russian immigration should continue, but say the current conversion process should be changed to make conversions more available and less degrading.

Yisrael b'Aliyah takes a third stance: Since "only" about 30,000 of the non-Jewish immigrants are eligible for citizenship through the grandfather clause, the party argues that it's not worth tampering with the Law of Return. Still, the party thinks JAFI should stop actively seeking potential immigrants who fall under the grandfather clause.

"The Jewish Agency sometimes gets into the mindset that they must have a certain number of immigrants, so they end up scraping the bottom of the barrel," said Kazhdan. Instead, JAFI should work on infusing potential immigrants with Jewish identity and streamlining the conversion bureaucracy, which would solve more problems than changing the Law of Return, he said.

Yet immigration is crucial for Israel, as projections show that without significant immigration, Arabs will outnumber Jews between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River within several generations.

Artistic 'dream team' tackles Chekhov classic plays

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

A "dream team" of Canadian actors, playwrights and directors gather for rehearsals at the du Maurier Theatre, in preparation for the Soulpepper premiere of Absolutely Chekhov.

One of several Jewish contributors, including Adam Pettle, Jason Sherman and Daniel Brooks, is Toronto-born Leah Cherniak, an award-winning writer, director, actor and teacher. She's also a mother, and today she's running behind schedule.

"The reason I'm late," she says, "is because I had to enrol my five-year-old daughter in Downtown Jewish Day School. And I'm really nervous about it."

Although she considers herself a "less-than-secular" Jew, she values the communal experience and wants to provide her daughter with a base from which to grow. She worries about the speed of technology, the size of cities and widespread human alienation. The face-to-face human experience, she says, cannot be replaced.

It is that sense of human interaction that attracts Cherniak to the Russian playwright.

"My interest in Chekhov is his lovely, detailed attention to everyday life and how there are hidden treasures within that speak about bigger secrets and fears of people.

"As Canadians, I think we have a language vocabulary that mutes a lot of our emotions, mutes a lot of our passions. So, there's a lot going on underneath us as well. I think there's a profound visceral understanding, even if we don't know it, of Chekhov's work."

Leah Cherniak

Albert Schultz, artistic director of Soulpepper, describes Absolutely Chekhov as a "love letter" from Canadian playwrights. The program consists of four short farces, or "vaudevilles," and one original one-act play.

Though Chekhov lived only 44 years, he changed the face of modern drama. It was the study of ordinary human lives as opposed to the complicated plots of earlier works that stood at the fore of such works as Uncle Vanya, The Cherry Orchard and The Seagull. But the transition from his popular one-act comedies to longer dramas did not come without a personal cost.

The Old Business, directed by Cherniak and co-written by Canadian Jewish playwright Jason Sherman and Susan Coyne, and the only original work in the Soulpepper production, is about Chekhov's life at the time of the disastrous premiere of The Seagull, in 1896.

Sherman recalls reading biographical information on the night's events that tell of Chekhov running from the theatre to hide under the blankets in his friend's bed, in an attempt to escape audience hisses, after the first curtain.

He almost gave up writing that night – a frightening thought when you think about his influence on successors including Arthur Miller, Tennessee Williams and George Bernard Shaw, playwrights whose work might never have seen the stage lights, if Chekhov had not returned to re-mount the play two years later under the direction of the Moscow Art Theatre.

The second production was met with critical acclaim and mass public acceptance because, Chekhov said at the time, the actors understood their roles.

"I think the writers [of The Old Business] want to have an experience of Chekhov in a place of despair," Cherniak says, "and [a] sense of what the writer's dilemma is—the public nature of failure."

Asked about working with Cherniak, Sherman says, "She's like all the best directors: very concerned that the writer's vision is served."

Furthermore, when you speak to Cherniak, you can't help but feel heard. She thinks like a director, attaching meaning to nuance, pausing slightly between thoughts to formulate beautifully crafted sentences, wasting not a word.

Her mastery of verbal and non-verbal communication comes from years of theatrical training, first at the University of Toronto and later, the Jacques Lecoq School of Mime, Movement and Theatre, in Paris. In Paris, she met Martha Ross and together they founded Theatre Columbus.

Since its inception in 1983, the company has won 11 Dora Awards, and Cherniak has garnered the Pauline McGibbon Award for directing. Ross and Cherniak have co-written, directed and produced several hit shows, including the Chalmers Award-winning The Betrayal. Themes of marital infidelity, family dynamics, loneliness and stress – stories of ordinary lives – infuse their work.

"The themes of my plays have a lot to do with family," Cherniak says. "It tends to be key both in the working process and creating an environment for the work."

As for what audiences can expect from Absolutely Chekhov, Cherniak says, "Although this is work that was happening in the 1800s, it still speaks to audiences today. It's just dressed up in different clothes with a different sense of language."

Absolutely Chekhov opens Sept. 9 and runs until Sept. 28 at the du Maurier Theatre, 231, Queens Quay W., Toronto. For tickets and information call 416-973-4000 or visit www.soulpepper.ca

Series documents Eastern Front war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It was, simply, the biggest war of the 20th century.

Nazi Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, launched on June 22, 1941, was a titanic clash of imperial powers. It turned into a bloody struggle that claimed the lives of almost 30 million people, including hundreds of thousands of Jews, and defined the nature and outcome of World War II.

On Monday, Sept. 23 at 10 p.m., TV Ontario presents the first of four instalments of War of the Century, a superb BBC/History Channel series on the conflict by Laurence Rees, who created Nazis: A Warning from History.

Like the latter, War of the Century is meticulously produced, based on vivid archival footage and revealing interviews.

In hindsight, Germany's thrust into the Soviet Union was a catastrophic mistake, but a boon for humanity: the war sapped Germany's strength and led to the downfall of the Third Reich.

Adolf Hitler badly underestimated the Soviet Union, his ideological foe, and assumed that Germany would win. This assessment was shared by foreign observers, including the Americans.

Hitler and his generals had reason to be sanguine. The Soviet army had performed poorly in Finland in 1939, and Germany had easily rolled over France, Holland and Belgium in 1940.

Germany, driven by a desire to expand eastward, seize raw materials and eradicate communism, struck along a 1,800-kilometre front, throwing three million soldiers into the massive offensive. In the first week, Germany made impressive territorial gains and 150,000 Soviet soldiers were killed or severely wounded.

The victories reinforced Germany's belief that its Bolshevik adversary, supposedly under the sway of Jews, was intellectually and morally inferior.

TVO Series documents brutal war

During this period, when Germany seemed invincible, Soviet Jews lived in terrible fear. This would be a war of annihilation, as Hitler had predicted.

German atrocities were perpetrated not only by special killing squads (Einsatzgruppen), but by the German army as well. The Holocaust in the Soviet Union unfolded with terrifying precision.

Jews were ruthlessly hunted down, often with the help of local collaborators such as Ukrainians. As is pointed out, many Ukrainians initially welcomed the Germans, hoping they would free Ukraine of the Soviet yoke and support their aspirations for statehood.

They were to be bitterly disappointed. At best, the Germans were willing to grant Ukrainians only limited independence, and the brutal character of Germany's occupation alienated most Ukrainians.

One of the most intriguing revelations in War of the Century turns on one of Stalin's desperate decisions. With the tide running in Germany's favour, and with the knowledge that 650,000 Soviet troops had just surrendered in Kiev, Stalin put out feelers for a peace treaty.

Germany was not interested, being determined to push on to the Volga River, the site of the city of Stalingrad.

But Stalingrad was a turning point, a huge German defeat. Buoyed by the victory, and having greatly improved its battlefield tactics, the Soviet Union proceeded to recover lost ground.

By war's end, the Red Army had evolved into an accomplished fighting force, appropriating the Germans' blitzkrieg strategy and beating them at their own game.

Yet, as they swept into eastern Germany, Soviet soldiers also committed war crimes, raping upwards of two million German women.

As War of the Century suggests, the war on Germany's eastern front is one of unbridled brutality in which rank human passions spiralled out of control.

TRAVEL TALK

SUKKOT IN JERUSALEM — AN ANCIENT CUSTOM

With weather that is usually idyllic and a national atmosphere that is usually celebratory, the holiday of Sukkot (Sept. 21 to 27 this year) is normally regarded one of the best times to be in Israel. Corresponding to the harvest season, Sukkot is one of three festivals that drew multitudes of Jews to Jerusalem in days of old – before the Romans destroyed the Temple in 70 CE.

Clearly eager to revive the trend, Israel's Ministry of Tourism is promoting numerous holiday-related events, including a pre-Sukkot concert featuring top-notch international talent, to be given along the Temple Mount's Southern Wall.

The concert, Strings Above Jerusalem – Hearts of the World, is scheduled for Sept. 19 along the Southern Wall excavations of Jerusalem's Old City. It showcases violin virtuosos Nigel Kennedy, a protégé of the late Sir Yehudi Menuhin, and Maxim Vengerov, a 28-year-old violin superstar from the former Soviet Union.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, President Moshe Katsav, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert and scores of international dignitaries are expected to attend. Proceeds are earmarked for a proposed new arts centre for children with special needs.

Other Sukkot-Related Events

• Throughout the year, visitors to Israel's Neot Kedumim Biblical Landscape Reserve may view biblical plants and animals, and learn how life was lived in biblical times. During Sukkot, the reserve presents a harvest festival, during which visitors are shown how a sukkah can be built in unusual places such as on a camel's back or a haystack.

• Alternative theatre, children's productions and street events are featured during the Israeli Fringe Theatre Festival, set for the historic northern coastal city of Acre, Sept. 21 to 24.

• The magnificent Dead Sea oasis of Ein Gedi is the setting of the Tamar Festival, which offers three days of workshops, tours, food fairs and performances by top Israeli musicians. Sept. 23 to 25.

Different views of Israeli-Palestinian conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three Israeli films that probe the nature of Israel's perennial conflict with the Palestinians were screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival.

Kedma, by Amos Gitai, is set in 1948, on the eve of Israeli statehood. It focuses on a bedraggled group of European Jewish immigrants who land on a beach in the face of British opposition.

Local Angel, by Udi Aloni, is an earnest reflection, through music and political discourse, of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Promise Land, an animated short by Gili Dolev, satirizes Palestinian suicide bombers, Israeli settlers, reporters in Israel and the so-called Israeli and Palestinian "silent majority."

Kedma, starring Andrei Kashkar and Helena Yarolova, unfolds in Hebrew, Yiddish, Arabic, Polish and Russian against the backdrop of the waning British mandate, the arrival of Jewish refugees and the corresponding flight of Palestinians from their villages.

The Kedma, a ship steaming for the coast of Palestine whose name means "toward the Orient," is filled with Holocaust survivors from Poland and the Soviet Union.

When they disembark, a platoon of British soldiers is hiding in wait, but a Palmach force guides the immigrants to a makeshift camp. As they trudge through drab, sun-bleached fields, they cross paths with a band of Palestinians heading toward Arab lines.

The camera pans the immigrants as they respond to their new environment.

With startling suddenness, the men from the Kedma are given rudimentary lessons on how to use a Sten submachine gun. Although they have no military training, they are sent to attack an Arab hilltop position. The frenetic battle scene is filmed in cinéma vérité style by a hand-held camera. It is an effective tableau of the horrors and unpredictability of war.

Gitai uses the aftermath of the carnage to convey blunt messages, which take the form of stagey soliloquies voiced by a Palestinian and a Jewish immigrant. The Palestinian man, a refugee-in-the-making, suggests that the dispersal of his people was caused by both Arab and Jewish forces. And he exclaims that the Palestinians will always defy the Jews.

The issue of land ownership, the crux of the problem, is superficially disposed of when a middle-aged Arab woman claims the territory the Jews have seized belongs to the Palestinians.

Reeling from the shock and trauma of the just-concluded battle, Janusz, a weary Jewish immigrant, holds forth philosophically on the course of Jewish history, the suffering of Jews down through the ages and Israel's Jewish identity. It all sounds forced, even theatrical, as if Gitai is pushing words into his character's mouth.

Pessimistic and emotionally distant, Kedma gets bogged down in the quagmire of its dogmas.

In Local Angel, Aloni – the son of Israeli civil libertarian and politician Shulamit Aloni – attempts to deconstruct Israel's bitter struggle with the Palestinians. An artist who has been living in New York City for the past eight years, he returns to Israel and is chastened by the apparent hopelessness of it.

The other protagonists in Local Angel are Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi, the Arab rap group DAM, vocalists David Daor and Dikla, Ben-Gurion University philosopher Haviva Pedaya and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

The gist of it is that the Palestinians are unjustly demonized as terrorists, that they will resist Israel's occupation, that peace would have taken hold had Yitzhak Rabin lived, that Arab terrorism is inspired by Israeli extremism, that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has blood on his hands and that Israeli and Palestinian negotiators came close to signing an agreement after the failed Camp David summit in July 2000.

The filmmaker, an unabashed opponent of Zionism, espouses a binational state in what is now Israel. It is, to be charitable, a peripheral, naive and unrealistic idea.

The only appealing aspect of Local Angel is its music, especially Daor's sweet, angelic voice. It is simply incredible.

Promise Land is a wild, sardonic, colourful ride into the maelstrom of the Palestinian uprising. Through graphic cartoons and black humour, Dolev skewers suicide bombers' yearning for martyrdom, brands Jewish settlers in the territories as aggressors, lampoons insensitive foreign correspondents and lambastes Israelis and Palestinians seeking mutual destruction.

Understanding dreams can help solve problems

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dreams are the way the subconscious mind gives solutions to conflicts, says Layne Dalfen, a Montreal dream analyst.

The trick, she believes, is to translate the metaphors in a dream in order to identify what each person or thing in it represents and what message is being given by the dream as a whole.

Dalfen has just published a book on the subject, Dreams Do Come True, (Adams Media Corporation, 2002). While she is a Gestalt counsellor with training in dream analysis in the traditions of Alfred Adler and Carl Jung, her book is for lay people. "I synthesized the information I have gained into plain English."

Dalfen is a member of the C.G. Jung Society and the Association for the Study of Dreams.

She will be in Toronto to promote her book the week of Sept. 22, when she will appear on on CTV's Canada AM and CITY-TV, on CFRB radio, and in Chapters bookstores throughout the city.

In a telephone interview, Dalfen stressed that "you are the only person who can really understand your dreams. Your own past, your own history, your own experiences are expressed in them."

Dalfen's job is to help her clients understand what a dream is all about.

As an example, a client she calls Melanie dreamed about carrying a huge laundry basket up some stairs. She was having a lot of trouble, because there were many people in her way. At the top, there was a huge, terrifying man, who nevertheless made the people move so that she could get up the stairs.

Using the insight that "all the characters in a dream are you: you give the metaphors," Dalfen discovered that Melanie was going to school, holding down a job and was pregnant – a heavy load for anyone.

The man at the top of the stairs was frightening to Melanie even though he helped her, because Melanie was basically not an assertive person. However, "that doesn't mean she doesn't have it in her" to be more aggressive, Dalfen said.

She had to have the strength to say that the job was too much for her and that her husband would have to carry the financial load, Dalfen said. In effect, "she has to become that big guy."

The wonderful aspect of the human condition, Dalfen said, is that "you are born with all the characteristics you will have. Your parents teach you it is better to be one way or another."

Somewhere along the line, Dalfen said, Melanie had learned that is is not OK to say "no" to people. "She was overinvested in being accommodating, and underinvested in being selfish."

Dalfen stressed that she is not implying that change is simply a matter of understanding the messages in your dreams. In fact, you may have several different dreams that all suggest ways to solve whatever problem is bothering you at the moment.

The dreams indicate that your subconscious wants you to pay attention to that problem, she said. However, she added, the priorities of the subconscious mind may be different than those you are aware of when you are awake.

Although some dream metaphors are fairly universal, such as being chased, others may be more individual. For instance, Dalfen said that for her, a cat in a dream signifies arrogant independence and a lack of affection and need for others, characteristics she does not like. "I would have to ask myself, is another person behaving like that? Am I?"

Her daughter, on the other hand, loves cats but can't have one because of allergies. To her, then, a cat may mean she must get away from a relationship that is not good for her.

Dalfen said that while a dream may point to an ongoing problem, "at the first level, it addresses something very current."

For example, dreaming about being chased is a common metaphor for being overwhelmed or afraid. The point, she said, is to work out "why you are being chased this week."

A nightmare is somewhat different from a regular dream, she said. "It grabs your attention. Your [subconscious] wants you to do something right away."

Listening to the message, she said, "frees the energy that is wrapped up in [dealing with a] conflict."

Dalfen emphasized that interpreting dreams "isn't rocket science." If someone has a serious psychological or psychiatric problem, she sends them to the appropriate therapist.

Her Dream Interpretation Centre – founded in 1979 in Montreal as the first such institute in Canada – aims to discover how problems or issues are addressed in dreams, to learn how dreams can reveal what prevents people from dealing with problems, to recognize how dreams reflect what is going on in waking life and to learn how to identify and work with dream symbols.

For more information, contact Dalfen at 514-481-8081, via e-mail at layne@dreamsdocometrue.ca, or visit her Web site at dreamsdocometrue.ca.

Iraq says will attack Israel if it 'interferes' in U.S. strike

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates — Iraq will attack Israel if it takes part in any U.S. strike against President Saddam Hussein's government, an Iraqi minister said in remarks published late last week.

"Israel will suffer a profound and an unforgettable strike if it interferes in the [U.S.-led] war [against Iraq]," Iraqi Trade Minister Mohammed Mahdi Saleh told the United Arab Emirates newspaper Al-Khaleej.

Israel has warned it will retaliate if Iraq attacks it. During the 1991 Gulf War, Israel refrained from retaliation after 39 Iraqi Scud missiles landed in the Jewish State. Its government decided to hold back to help the United States maintain Arab support for the coalition fighting the Iraqi forces that had invaded Kuwait.

Last week, Israel's army chief, Lt. Gen. Moshe Yaalon said that the United States wanted Israel to stay out of any military operation against Iraq.

"America would be very happy if we are not involved in this attack, at least at this stage," he said. "Let them do the job alone."

Saleh said a U.S. strike against Iraq would help Israel become stronger in the Middle East.

"The attack will shatter the Arab people and make Israel more strong in the region," he told Al-Khaleej.

Saleh's comments came amid rising speculation that the United States is gearing up to strike Iraq and oust Saddam. Last Thursday, President George W. Bush warned Iraq that it must comply with UN Security Council resolutions and admit UN weapons inspectors or face confrontation.

Since 1998, Iraq has refused access to UN weapons inspectors, who are charged with verifying the country has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction.

Palestinians use Kassam 3s for first time, says IDF

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Force (IDF) experts believe the rockets fired last week by Palestinian militants from the Gaza Strip that landed in the western Negev desert were Kassam 3s, Ha'aretz has learned.

This would be the first time Palestinians have used Kassam 3 rockets, which have a longer range and carry a larger charge than previous versions. With a range of up to 12 kilometres, the Kassam 3 could easily hit large population centres.

The range of the Kassam 2 is between five and six kilometres, while Hamas boasts that the new version has a range of between 10 and 12 kilometres. According to IDF estimates, the rockets fired over the past two days reached up to eight kilometres.

In addition, the calibre of the Kassam 3s is 170mm, compared to 110mm on the previous version.

It is believed that the rockets were fired by Hamas or Islamic Jihad activists. The accuracy of the new model Kassam is still thought to be poor; IDF armaments experts are currently examining the remains.

Palestinians first used the Kassam 2 this past January, despite Israeli warnings of massive retaliation.

If you have played any social bridge, you are probably familiar with the feeling of frustration that comes from being dealt bad cards all night long. You cannot do much except sit there as the opponents keep bidding and making games and slams. The luck of the deal plays a major role in who wins and who loses when bridge is played socially.

Bridge with Gitelman

Tournament bridge gets around this problem by using what is known as duplicate scoring. In duplicate bridge, the same deals are played at several different tables. Each partnership's results are compared only with the results of other partnerships that were dealt the same cards. In duplicate bridge, it is possible to be dealt a lot of horrible hands and still be a winner – all that matters is that you score better than the other players who were dealt the same horrible hands that you were.

This deal took place at the recent World Bridge Championships in Montreal in an event called the World Open Pairs – the biggest and most prestigious duplicate bridge tournament of them all. The main lesson of this deal is that the form of scoring is not the only thing that makes duplicate bridge different from social bridge – the strategies of the two games can be different as well.

North
♠ Q73
♥ 10852
♦ 82
♣ AQ95

South
♠ A2
♥ AKJ973
♦ AK94

I became the declarer in six hearts after East opened the bidding with a weak 2-bid in spades (suggesting a good six-card spade suit and roughly 5-10 high card points). The opening lead was a spade. I tried the ♠Q from dummy, but East covered with the ♠K. I won my ♠A and played the ♥A and ♥K. West had been dealt a singleton heart and East started with a doubleton ♥Q. What now?

Playing social bridge, this would not be much of a problem. I could ruff my two diamond losers in the dummy and lose only a spade trick at the end to make my slam. As this was a duplicate tournament, I did not play this way. I held my breath and finessed the ♣Q! When I exhaled, the finesse had won. I was able to discard my ♠2 on the ♣A and claim my contract with an overtrick!

Yes, it is true that I would have gone down in my slam contract if the club finesse had lost. In fact, my play risked more than 1000 points for a 30-point overtrick. In a social bridge game, that would be madness. However, in duplicate bridge all that matters is beating the other pairs who were dealt the same cards as my partner and myself.

Given that I was playing in the World Championships, I expected most partnerships to bid to 6♥ with these hands. In order to have chance to score better than these pairs, I knew I had to go all out and try to win 13 tricks.

P.S. My partner (Brad Moss from New York City) and I finished in 14th place. That may not sound too good, but given that more than 250 of the world's best pairs played in this event, it is not bad at all!

Orthodox hoopster signs with Israeli team

By PHIL JACOBS
Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE — Tamir Goodman once wrote in his seventh-grade yearbook that his dream was to play professional basketball for Israel's top team, Maccabi Tel Aviv.

Now his dream has come true.

According to Steven Heumann, Goodman's friend and attorney, the 20-year-old basketball phenomenon has signed a three-year contract with Maccabi Tel Aviv, Israel's most prestigious basketball team and a force in European basketball.

"The first thing that came to my mind was baruch HaShem [blessed is God]," said Goodman. "There is no other way to look at it. Without HaShem's blessing, this never would have happened.

"Everyone has a special talent in the world. With me, it is basketball. Whatever your talent is, it is your job to develop it and bring Godliness to it. I've had a lot of ups and downs, but it is so clear to me what HaShem has given me an opportunity to do."

Maccabi Tel Aviv plays an 82-game schedule and competes in three different leagues, including the Israel League, the Adriatic League and the Euro League. Maccabi Tel Aviv finished in the final four of the powerful Euro League last year, and won it outright the previous year.

In the first year of the deal, Goodman may be loaned to Hapoel Galil Elyon to give him more playing time, Heumann said. The team plays in the same Israel League as Maccabi Tel Aviv.

It's a common practice within European basketball for teams to loan players within divisions, Heumann added.

Part of the deal is that Goodman, an Orthodox Jew who is considered a popular role model in the United States and Israel, will not be required to play or practice on Shabbat.

"There is a clause in his contract that he is not required to participate in team activities that require him to desecrate the Sabbath or any other Jewish holiday," Heumann said.

Heumann believes this is the first time such a clause has been inserted in a professional basketball contract.

He also said Goodman will likely be the first player in at least a decade to wear a kippah during Israel League games.

Financial terms of the contract were not released, but Heumann said "this is a good contract for him. It is in line with other young European star-calibre players for first-time contracts."

Practice will start later this summer.

Goodman, a six-foot-three guard, captured the attention of the global basketball world when international media outlets featured the Talmudical Academy junior for both his athletic skills and commitment to Judaism.

He initially considered attending the University of Maryland, College Park, but opted out when there was a question over the school respecting his Shabbat observance.

He then attended Towson University, but he parted company with the team after the basketball coach, Michael Hunt, allegedly threatened him with physical harm following a game last December. Goodman, a sophomore, finished the school year at Towson under scholarship, completing his courses.

In trips to Israel, Goodman has been flocked by thousands of children and young adults. He has put on skill demonstrations and then delivered discussions on the week's Torah portion. He has even appeared on Israel's most popular television talk show, speaking fluent Hebrew.

"Everything that has happened to me has been a 100 per cent brachah [blessing]," Goodman said recently. "Even what happened at Towson, and that's so behind me, was a brachah.

"I'm not bitter about anything," he said. "Again, I see this all as God's plan for me. I guess I'm a trailblazer. Some people felt that after Towson, it was a sign for me to get out of basketball, that maybe it wasn't right for me. But that isn't the case. God has a special plan for me, but it's my job to develop the plan.

"I'm not an amazing person," Goodman said. "I'm just following God's plan."

Maccabi Haifa advances in Champions League soccer

By DORON BERGERFREUND
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GRAZ, Austria — Maccabi Haifa has turned a decade-old dream into reality, becoming the first Israeli team to qualify for the prestigious European Champions League, along with 31 other clubs that are the cream of European soccer.

In a pulsating second-leg encounter with Sturm Graz of Austria, Maccabi Haifa drew 3-3, good enough for a 5-3 aggregate win.

The match was full of drama and excitement, as the Austrians took an early lead from an Eddie Bosnar free kick in the 11th minute that went through the wall and beat diving goalkeeper Dudu Awat.

Despite the early setback, Haifa maintained its composure. Giovanni Rosso scored an equalizer, putting the ball under the Graz goalkeeper, Heinz Webber, from a sharp angle on the right in the 27th minute. The score remained even up to halftime.

Haifa received a real fright in the second half when Imre Szabics made it 2-1 for the hosts in the 58th minute. To make matters worse, Ayegbeni Yakoubu, who was a real thorn in the Graz defence, was sent off in the 68th minute after he clashed with a Graz defender who was breaking forward on the counter-attack.

Things got really desperate when Guenter Neukirschner scored Graz's third in the 73rd minute, and Haifa looked as if it would collapse completely.

But as the Austrians threw everything into attack, a clever counter move by Haifa saw Rosso, who was again the inspirational player for the team, set up a move from the left that ended with Adoram Keisi sneaking in and blasting the ball into the top of the Graz net from close range.

Two minutes later, parity was restored as Bosnar, who scored the first goal, was sent off for a foul on Nenad Prelja.

That put Haifa back in the driver's seat again, but only temporarily.

Graz threw caution to the wind and left its defence wide open in the final minute of the match, to allow Raimondas Zautautas to put Walid Badir behind Graz's defense with only Webber to beat.

Badir rounded the keeper and made no mistake, scoring the equalizing goal. Even with four minutes of extra time, there was no doubting the result and the historic achievement Haifa registered in the annals of Israeli soccer.

"This is a very happy moment, what more can I say," club chairman Yaakov Shahar stated after the match.

Following the game, Shahar travelled to Monaco for the groups draw, which saw Haifa draw perennial powerhouse Manchester United as its next opponent in Champions League play.

High Holy Days, Jews and courage

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

After the Holocaust, a very uncomfortable view began to surface regarding the intransigence of North American Jewry and its questionable efforts to help rescue the Jews of Europe. In his book, The Scared and the Doomed, M.J. Nurenberger calls this period and state of mind "a collective Jewish paralysis."

This point of view also received enormous press in the 1960s and 1970s due to such publications as Perfidy, by Ben Hecht – a book that slammed mainstream Jewish leadership and its "insufficient" reaction to the mass murder of Europe's Jews.

This thesis was, and is, very painful, as it cuts to the essence of our self-image as a kind-hearted and caring people. It poses the question: if indeed the Jews of North America did not aggressively respond to the pleas of European Jews during the Holocaust, what does this say about our Jewishness? When Jewish sages state that to be a Jew is to care about others, are those who do not care still Jews?

Fifty-seven years after the Holocaust, the same question can still be asked: are Jews today rising above that "paralysis" and responding to the needs of others, when called upon? Clearly, there are Jews in every generation whose courage blossoms when a Jewish life is in peril. The names Tress, Dunkelman and Feld-Carr remind us that Jewish soldiers are everywhere.

But what about amchah, the others? What about the regular shul-going Jew? And what about Jewish organizations? Can Jews and people in distress rely on them? Can we rely on Jewish organizations in general to lead us down a courageous road?

As the new year begins, these questions must be asked by every Jew. We must stand before God, bare our souls and truly determine whether we are working toward enhancing the lives of others and growing as Jews.

We must aggressively go through the painful process of personal and communal introspection to determine if we are fighting anti-Semitism and racism. Are we rescuing Jews imprisoned because of their Jewishness? Are we acting in a decent, empathetic fashion in our places of work, at restaurants or on the street? We must ask ourselves: are we fighters for Judaism and are we pursuers of peace?

In 5763, perhaps, we the members of the Toronto Jewish community should make a commitment to speak loudly at every simchah about imprisoned Iranian Jews. Let us also collectively pledge to assist the Jews of Argentina and gather the courage to travel to Israel to be with our Jewish family on the front lines.

Let us all agree that we will fight injustices levelled at any person weaker or poorer than us and live up to the Jewish imperative that says: "A person who runs to do just, good and kind deeds attains life, success and honour" (Proverbs 21:21).

Every Jew in 5763 can fight a valiant fight, especially when the risk is greatest. We are a hearty people. Every Holocaust survivor who fought in Israel's War of Independence will attest to that. May this be a year when any collective paralysis dissipates and the radiance that emanates from the Jewish people shines brighter than ever. Acceptance, wisdom and brotherhood and sisterhood should permeate our homes.

Shimon [the son of Rabban Gamliel] says: "It is not what one says, but rather what one does that makes all the difference in the world" (Pirkei Avot 1:17).

Peace in Israel. Peace in the world. Shanah Tovah.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a problem with my brother. He is 38 and has just been through his second failed marriage and is always in and out of jobs. In a word, he is irresponsible. My problem is that he blames everything on my parents and how they raised him.

Though my parents had a rocky marriage and were separated twice, they never gave up and got through some very difficult times. Granted, they were not the best role models and there were emotional issues, but we always had a roof over our heads, food in our stomachs and nice clothes.

My brother is constantly blaming them for what his life has become, using not-so-subtle digs and sometimes, all-out accusations. I can't stand being in the middle of this. Help!

Enough Blame

Dear Enough Blame,

Your brother sounds like he has a whole barrage of issues he needs to deal with, the first of which is to take responsibility for his own life. All parents leave their mark when raising their children. I'm sure it couldn't have been all bad, but your brother seems to have focused on the difficult times which allows him to blame them for the direction his own life has taken. It is always easier to blame others than to take responsibility for yourself.

It sounds to me like it is time your brother gets professional help. He needs to work though his issues that seem to be hindering him from moving forward with his life instead of living in the past.

At 38, he needs to be able to stand on his own two feet and be accountable for the path he is taking. Apron strings aren't that long. At some point they snap.

As for you and your parents, you could probably use someone to vent to and help you through this as well. Guilt is a very strong emotion and if you are the victim of someone who knows how to work guilt well, it can be devastating.

This is really your brother's problem. He is just taking you all along for the ride.

Jewish Life in Toronto... How it all Began

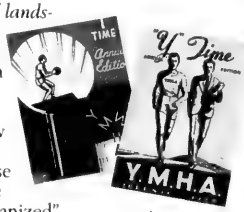
The following are pivotal pieces that together made up the landscape of early Toronto Jewish life, and prove from early on that we stand stronger together.

Keeping count during a past UJA Federation Campaign

In the 1880s, the Jews of Eastern Europe, living under oppression and persecution, set sail for a new way of life. Many settled in Toronto.

An early planning meeting for what would become the Northern Y

The majority of landsmanshaften were formed by individuals from the same shtetl, or village, and, other than a few scattered synagogues, these landsmanshaften symbolized "organized" Judaism in Toronto at the time.



Early programs from the Bloor "Y"

But the societies also symbolized our sacred responsibility for each other and our understanding that collective caring and collective strength go hand in hand. As the years went by, several other organizations sprang up in Toronto to raise money for various needs.

Toronto's Jewish Mayor, Phillip Givens, joins a UJA Mission to Israel

Toronto's first Jewish Y on Brunswick Avenue

In 1917, Toronto's first Jewish Federation – The Federation of Jewish Philanthropies – was incorporated, replacing the unorganized collection of individual charities raising funds for their own causes. The Federation's primary responsibility was fundraising for what was to become United Jewish Appeal.

The Talmud Torah stood shoulder to shoulder with the Brunswick Ave "Y"

The following pages stand as a testimonial to the Jewish community of Toronto. From the 19th century, into the new millennium, the people of Jewish Toronto have passionately rallied around the needs of their community and the State of Israel.

Whether it's the past, present, or well into the future, there is one indisputable fact that we have learned from our history as Jews: we are stronger together.

The Great Depression brought about important changes in Toronto's Jewish community

Unity During the Depression

They say that in every cloud there's a silver lining. In the Jewish Toronto of the 1930s, the Great Depression consolidated community philanthropy. Toronto established the United Jewish Welfare Fund in 1937, incorporating the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, Talmud Torah, the United Palestine Fund, and other organizations.

The Welfare Fund, now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, served as a unifying force for local Jewish organizations, creating the machinery needed for institutional and financial unity.

Toronto Jewry led the Canadian effort to fight Nazism

Standing up to Nazism

Hitler's reign of horror united North American Jews, bringing Toronto Jewry together from every stream. A Jewish conference was formed to promote a cooperative effort against Nazism.

The conference elected a committee in the spring of 1933 which led to the creation of the League for the Defense of Jewish Rights, under the leadership of Rabbi Samuel Sachs and Shmuel Meir Shapiro, editor of the Hebrew Journal.

Toronto's Jewish community led the Canadian fight against Nazism as its League for the Defense of Jewish Rights went on to join similar organizations in Montreal and Winnipeg.

A baseball game helped unify Jews and make them feel "safe at home"

1933 Christie Pits Riots

One of the most devastating, yet crucial, events in early Toronto's Jewish history started with a baseball game and ended with a riot at Christie Pits at the corner of Christie and Bloor.

Two hundred Jewish teens confronted swastika-carrying neo-Nazis in the same year in which Hitler came to power.

After the game, which was won by Harbord Collegiate, these same youngsters tried – in vain – to intimidate the Jewish ball players and even threatened them physically.

The riot was a rallying cry for Toronto's Jewish community, galvanizing Jews in a way that would be vital for the community's survival and success.

Coming Together at Bloor and Spadina

In 1953, a key component of Jewish life in downtown Toronto was established with the construction of the Jewish community centre, popularly known as the South "Y" at the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue.

Moving from its original incarnation on Brunswick Avenue next to the Talmud Torah, the Bloor "Y" has, for almost 50 years, served the cultural, recreational, and even the social assistance needs of Jews and non-Jews alike. Now the Bloor "Y" is being transformed into the new, modern Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"Historically, the whole downtown area of Toronto has been the home to the Jewish community. The Bloor JCC is the corner of that whole community," says David Green, Chairman of the Miles Nadal JCC Capital Campaign.

Jewish Life Moves North

As Toronto's Jewish community continued to grow and prosper, it moved north and new facilities were needed to accommodate this migration.

On Sunday, December 7, 1958, public officials and prominent members of the Jewish community attended a groundbreaking for the "Y" – now the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) – at Bathurst north of Sheppard. Toronto's Jewish Mayor, Nathan Phillips, expressed pride during his civic greetings.

It was clearly a building whose time had come. In April 1961, more than 20,000 men, women, and children came to visit the new facility. Finally, on May 1, 1961, the Northern "Y" opened at a cost of $2.5 million with an initial membership of 7,300. Now, with plans underway for Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's Central Campus, the BJCC will be a focus for a new world-renowned Jewish cultural, educational and recreational centre.

The 1958 groundbreaking for the new Northern "Y"

In a Class By Itself

Historically, Toronto's Jewish community has been recognized as a worldwide Jewish centre of academic excellence. That reputation has been earned, in no small measure, because of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Founded in 1960 as a co-ed Jewish community high school, CHAT - until the 1979-1980 school year - occupied one wing in the Associated Hebrew Schools building on Neptune Ave. Eventually, CHAT made the move to its own facility on Wilmington Avenue, with ever-increasing enrollment.
On May 27, 1999, the expanded Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre, a Jewish Toronto Tomorrow project, officially opened on the Wilmington Campus.

Today, CHAT, North America's largest Jewish community high school, with over 1,400 students at two branches, is preparing for its eventual place on the 50-acre Vaughan Campus, another JTT initiative.

Today, CHAT boasts more than 1,400 students in 2 locations

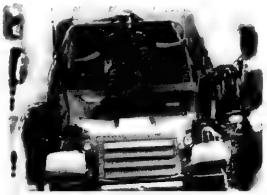
Starting a new life in a new State

1948 - At Long Last!

It was anything but business as usual at a session of the Provincial State Council in Tel Aviv at 4:00 p.m. on May 14, 1948. On this date, just hours before Shabbat, the council members were about to proclaim a State. The State of Israel. The first Jewish State in 2,000 years. On Sunday, May 16, 1948, thousands of Toronto Jews flocked to Maple Leaf Gardens for a massive rally sponsored by the United Zionist Council of Toronto. "I remember marching along College Street as a proud member of the Jewish community, celebrating the establishment of the new State of Israel," says Mira Koschitzky, who was 12 at the time. "I'll never forget the wonder, excitement, and goodwill of that evening."

1967 - The Six Day War

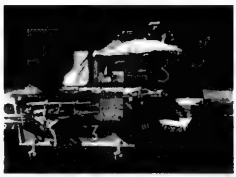
On May 15, 1967 during aYom Ha'atzmaut parade in Jerusalem, Israeli leaders received the news: Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser was in the process of deploying heavy military forces in the Sinai following three weeks of tensions that had built up between the two sides. The Israeli Defense Forces responded with a lightning attack on the Egyptian Air Force, leading to Israel's eventual victory in the Six-Day War, when Jerusalem was re-unified.



"The Kotel is ours!"

"I cried with joy and relief when I saw on television that Israel had reclaimed the Kotel," says Holocaust survivor, Anita Ekstein. "In fact, I can still cry about that feeling of pride and joy I felt back then, even today, over 30 years later."

1973 - The Yom Kippur War



Toronto Jews waited and worried during the Yom Kippur War

At 2:00 p.m. on Yom Kippur, 1973 - the Egyptian and Syrian armies began a coordinated offensive attack against Israel in the Sinai and Golan Heights.

Jews all over the world worried about Israel's survival and the unthinkable possibility of defeat, which Israel eventually averted, marching within kilometers of Damascus.

Toronto Rabbi Henry Hoschander remembers being in the middle of his Shabbat sermon at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, when news of the war came.

I announced it to the regation, and you could concern. The first es recite a psalm, regular

1998 - Celebrating Israel's 50th

The Night of a Lifetime was just that 1998 was a year to remember! In fact, it's a year that Israel will never forget, thanks to the extraordinary efforts of Toronto's Israel at 50 initiative – the largest celebration of Israel's Jubilee outside of the State itself. The Israel at 50 Consortium organized a Chanukah kick-off event at Queen's Park in December, 1997; The Night of a Lifetime, a spectacular production at the National Trade Centre in April, 1998, and The Israel Pavilion at the CNE in August of that year, which was visited by more than a million Torontonians.

The 2002 UJA Walk with Israel brought out 25,000 participants

Toronto Walks With Israel

Few things remain the same over the course of three decades, but the Toronto Jewish community's commitment to Israel has not only remained consistent, it has increased year-to-year. One of the most visible symbols of that commitment is the UJA Federation Israel Walkathon. Starting in 1970, with little time for planning and virtually no pre-publicity, the first-ever walkathon raised $55,000 toward UJA Federation. The Walkathon, which is to Walk with Israel, was an immediate hit, and an institution was born. The 2002 Walk with historic heights with an unprece participants, and over $

Answering Israel's Call

On September 27, 2000, months of Palestinian strategic planning gave birth to the beginning of a wave of violence against Israel that continues today.

Over 600 people have been killed by Palestinian terrorism, and over 4,000 have been wounded. In August 2001, Toronto's Jewish community, motivated by a request from Israeli Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, quickly set the wheels in motion to assist the people of Israel.

Led by the tireless efforts of Chairs Michael Bregman and David Koschitzky, Campaign 2002 – Israel Now and Forever - raised over $50 million, $6.5 million more than the previous year with gift increases designated for hard-pressed Israeli social services.

Moshe Arens, Senior Advisor to Israeli PM Sharon, is flanked by Chairs of Campaign 2002 - Israel Now and Forever - Michael Bregman (left) and David Koschitzky.

As Israel's emergency worsened, community mobilization efforts intensified for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, chaired by Ronnie Appleby and Howard Sokolowski.

The severity of Israel's situation compelled organizers to begin the emergency campaign in April, 2002, four months ahead of schedule.

Spurred on by Jewish Toronto's deep commitment to Israel, Campaign 2003 has already reached historic heights, buoyed by gift increases averaging 53%.

Expressing Israel Solidarity

Unprecedented generosity is not the only way in which our community demonstrates its devotion to Israel. Thousands of Torontonians have visited Israel on UJA Federation solidarity missions to literally stand side-by-side with the residents of our beleaguered Jewish nation. Toronto has sent more people than any other North American city over the past two years.

Israel Now Consortium

In today's Toronto, the Israel Now Consortium dramatically exemplifies the Jewish community's devotion to Israel. The Consortium, chaired by Julia Koschitzky, consists of over 100 Jewish organizations advocating for Israel, under the auspices of UJA Federation and Israel's Consulate General.

Consortium members represent the entire religious and ideological spectrum of the community. Over the past year and a half, 30,000 people have participated in Consortium-sponsored

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow:
Daring to Dream

Mayor Mel Lastman, (bottom centre) joined the JTT groundbreaking ceremony at the Kiever Shul

Sunday, April 16, 2000: Jewish Toronto's approach to philanthropy changed dramatically and the way was forged for ambitious renovations to our community's landscape.

At the Kiever Shul in downtown Toronto, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), was officially launched.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow encompasses three components: the Annual UJA Federation Campaign; the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, housing over $115 million in endowments; and, visionary Capital Projects on three campuses.

JTT takes the unique approach of making dreams come true by partnering interested philanthropists with community organizations, which are planning projects to meet growing community needs.

The JTT capital initiatives serve three burgeoning geographic centres of Jewish population.

Progress on the downtown campus is well underway with the transformation of the aging Bloor JCC into the new state-of-the-art Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, and construction of the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, at the University of Toronto.

The central campus in the Bathurst–Sheppard corridor will transform the existing Bathurst Jewish Community Centre into one of North America's pre-eminent facilities for Jewish culture, education and recreation.

North of Steeles, a 50-acre parcel of land at the corner of Weldrick and Bathurst will become the new northern campus for York Region's Jewish community, Canada's fastest growing.

Philanthropic innovation is the key to JTT's success. Not only are enthusiastic donors coming forward, they're getting together to create other pioneering enterprises such as:

- The Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF), chaired by David Lawee, Ken Tanenbaum and Mark Waldman.
- Women's Venture Philanthropy, chaired by Rhonda Richer and Karen Basian
- Family Philanthropy Forum, chaired by Michael Shulman

A week of mourning: old wounds, new atrocities

Last week, with the arrival of Yom Kippur, many Israelis commemorated the 29th anniversary of the Yom Kippur war. At right, a woman kneels at the grave of her son who fell in that war. Three days later, a suicide bomber struck in the heart of downtown Tel Aviv killing six people and injuring scores more. At left, a member of Zaka, the Victims Identification Unit, inspects a shattered window for pieces of human flesh. In a poignant irony, the family of one of the bombing victims donated his kidney to an eight-year-old Palestinian child. Please see story on page 34. [Israel photos]

Film exec defends Hitler mini-series

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Peter Sussman, a top executive at Alliance Atlantis, the Toronto-based company behind an upcoming mini-series on Adolf Hitler, says it will not offend Jewish viewers.

"I'm confident of our ability to do it right," he said in a recent interview. "I feel totally comfortable, though I'm aware of the sensitivities."

The working title of the two-night, four-hour series is Hitler. It's scheduled to be broadcast next May on CBS in the United States and a Canadian network yet to be determined.

Filming in Prague and Munich is set to begin in November. The shoot will take 10 to 12 weeks.

> 'Audiences should see why he fooled the country'

The $15- to $20-million dollar (US) production will be adapted from British historian Ian Kershaw's critically acclaimed biography, Hitler: 1899-1936: Hubris, published last year.

The series, which ends in 1933, the year Hitler was appointed chancellor of Germany, will be "purposeful and engaging," said Sussman, who heads up Alliance Atlantis' entertainment group.

But critics claim it will humanize Hitler and, by ending in 1933, leave out some essential aspects of his Nazi regime: the Nuremberg Laws, which defined Jewishness in racial terms and disenfranchised Jews, and the Final Solution, which caused the deaths of six million European Jews.

Irving Abella, a York University historian and former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, has expressed concern.

The News in Brief

Canada

Record Turnout

TORONTO — More than 7,000 people attended High Holy Day services put on by the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) at six Greater Toronto Area locations, the highest number since the JRCC began holding services in 1987. The centre, run by Chabad-Lubavitch to serve the 40,000 Russian Jews in the GTA, credits "several months of hard work," including phone calls, advertisements, Russian and English billboards and a Russian-language television commercial, for the turnout.

Israel

Security Fence

JERUSALEM — Israeli defence contractor Elbit will build an electronic security fence around Jerusalem. The first phase will be three miles long and cost $5 million (US), Israel Radio reported. Elbit has built similar barriers in Gaza and along the Lebanon border.

Vaccinations Begin

JERUSALEM — Israeli health officials began vaccinating hospital staff against smallpox last Wednesday. The move is the first step toward fulfilling a Security Cabinet decision to vaccinate some 15,000 security, health and rescue personnel who would comprise the "first response" teams should Iraq launch a biological attack on Israel.

Council Established

JERUSALEM — Palestinian officials have reportedly set up a council in east Jerusalem to administrate civilian affairs. According to Israel Radio, Sari Nusseibeh, the top Palestinian official in Jerusalem, has named a 28-member council that has set up 10 administrative offices in east Jerusalem. Members meet regularly to run such affairs as health and education, the report said. Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert denounced the move as "camouflage for subversion," adding that the Palestinians are not entitled to administer services provided by the municipality.

Evacuation Plan

JERUSALEM — The mayor of Ramat Gan, which was hit by Iraqi Scud missiles in 1991, said he will evacuate the city if Baghdad threatens to strike Israel again. Zvi Bar said he was making plans for the evacuation of the city's 125,000 people to a "tent city" in the south of the country, Yediot Achronot reported. In the 1991 Gulf War, 9,000 apartments in Ramat Gan, near Tel Aviv, were damaged, including 100 that were destroyed.

World

Papon Outcry

PARIS —France's justice minister is seeking legal grounds to overturn the surprise release last week of Nazi-era war criminal Maurice Papon. Dominique Perben said he was doing so because of the outcry against the release. A French appeals court ruled Papon, 92, was too old and sick to serve out his 10-year sentence. The high-ranking Vichy regime official began serving the sentence in October 1999 after being found guilty of helping deport 1,560 Jews to Nazi death camps in World War II.

Al Qaeda Link?

NEW YORK — An Al Qaeda member has been identified as one of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl's killers, the Associated Press reported. The identification was made by a Pakistani held but not charged in the kidnapping of Pearl, who was killed earlier this year after admitting to being Jewish in a video made by his captors. If true, it would be the first Al Qaeda link to the killing.

Denial Ruling

SYDNEY — The Australian Federal Court last week ordered a Holocaust denier to purge his Australia-based Web site of material saying the Holocaust never happened. It also ordered Fredrick Toben not to publish any such material anywhere on the Internet. In the first Australian decision on hate and the Web, the court ruled Toben's Web site was illegal under Australia's racial discrimination laws.

Ryerson Art Exhibit Draws Complaint

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, investigated a complaint last week from a Ryerson University student about artwork at a campus gallery that contained the words "Death to Israel."

The work also included images of the destruction of the World Trade Center, a portrait of Osama bin Laden and excerpts from the Christian Book of Revelations.

The display, by artist Iain Cameron, a part-time member of Ryerson's faculty of communications and design, began with the question "Justice will be done – or will justice be done?" and had a representation of the anthrax note sent to U.S. journalist Tom Brokaw that included the text "Death to American/Death to Israel."

In a letter to Ryerson president Claude Lajeunesse, CJC Ontario chair Ed Morgan asked that the display be removed prior to the Sept. 20 date it was scheduled to be dismantled. "This specific problem will be of short duration, [but] we believe that the core issues that inform this matter will have a longer lifespan," Morgan wrote.

"We find it difficult to imagine a context where 'Death to America' or 'Death to Israel' is appropriate, unless the context was critical of these hateful and violent statements. The exhibit, however, does not seem to express such criticism."

Ira Levine, dean of Ryerson's faculty of communications and design, said that as an American and as a Jew, he had no problems with the display. "It is essential to make a distinction between hateful ideas and an artist trying to come to terms with them. The artist is trying to deal with the reality that there is such hatred in our world," he said.

A sense of bashert in conviction of rabbi's killer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

For Penina Rosenblum, the end of a very long, painful ordeal came at a particularly significant time on the Jewish calendar.

After 16 years and four trials, Steven Tielsch was finally convicted on Sept. 13 – erev Shabbat between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur – of murdering Rosenblum's son Neil, a young rabbi from Toronto who, during a visit to Pittsburgh, happened to be, to use a shopworn phrase, in the wrong place at the wrong time.

But the long-awaited conviction "came at the right time," Penina Rosenblum, a retired teacher at Eitz Chaim Day School, told The CJN in an interview at her North York home. "The verdict came just before Yom Kippur, and in a way, it was to atone for Neil's death. God felt this was the time."

The Rosenblums, longtime members of B'nai Torah Congregation, are observant. Arthur Rosenblum, a businessman, rises at 6 a.m. each day to learn Torah before heading off to work. Neil, or "Nuti," as he was affectionately known, was the third of their five children and a graduate of Ner Israel Yeshiva in Thornhill. He was a student at its kolel when he was shot down in cold blood.

Then just 24 and the father of a month-old baby girl, Neil and his wife were visiting his in-laws in Pittsburgh before Passover in 1986. While returning from synagogue the night of April 17, in the predominantly Jewish district of Squirrel Hill, he was stopped by a stranger in a car who asked for directions. When Neil, clad in traditional Orthodox garb, approached, a passenger in the car pumped five bullets from a .380 calibre machine gun into the young rabbi's chest and stomach. He died hours later while undergoing emergency surgery.

But before losing consciousness, he was able to identify the vehicle as a dark-coloured Corvette. For years, that was the lone piece of physical evidence, but nothing came of it after hundreds of black and blue Corvettes and similar-looking sports cars were checked.

For two years, it seemed as though police forgot about the case, or had closed the book on it for lack of leads. Even a $50,000 (US) reward, raised between donors in Pittsburgh and Toronto in the weeks following the murder, failed to yield a clue, let alone a suspect.

Rabbi Neil Rosenblum

Then, in 1988, a break: Sanford Gordon, a heroin addict who was being held in the Allegheny County Jail on drug possession charges, told his lawyer and investigators that his cellmate, Tielsch, had been bragging about having killed, or "whacked," a rabbi or "a Jew [expletive]."

Tielsch was being held in the county jail on federal drug trafficking charges. (He still faces prosecution in a separate drug case.) Gordon, who is Jewish, reported that Tielsch had made numerous anti-Semitic remarks and had scrawled swastikas on his forehead. Another star witness, a money launderer, recalled the same behaviour by Tielsch in 1991.

Gordon, prodded by detectives to seek more information, said Tielsch told him that three weeks after the shooting, he had been stopped by a state trooper on the highway while driving a black Corvette, with the gun still in the car.

But authorities did not act on Gordon's information, and the case lay dormant for another 12 years until the Pittsburgh police force's cold case squad took it over. Local officials speculated the slaying was a random

An eventful weekend

While many of us were celebrating the holiday of Sukkot Sunday, events around the globe unfolded, as they usually do, at a swift pace. Certain thoughts regarding three of those events came to mind.

In Berlin, Germany's incumbent chancellor Gerhard Schroeder was re-elected to office, albeit with a reduced majority.

As of this writing, voter returns suggest Schroeder's Social Democratic Party and the Christian Social Union, the party of his main challenger Edmund Stoiber, received approximately the same number of votes, just under 40 per cent each, of the ballots cast.

But Schroeder's ability to cobble a coalition with the Greens party, taking advantage of the popularity of that party's high-profile flag-bearer, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, as an anchor for a new government, will tip the parliamentary scales in Schroeder's direction.

Though the incumbent, Schroeder began the race well behind his challenger, Stoiber, in the polls. But Schroeder's campaign turned sharply around when he abruptly – and many observers added, cynically – made the impending U.S. offensive against Saddam Hussein, the key plank of his platform.

Schroeder promised the electorate that under no circumstances, would German soldiers join the fight against Saddam Hussein, even if there were a Security Council mandate to do so.

Schroeder's promise was wildly popular with the voters. He seized on it and deployed it to its fullest, most strident hilt.

As a result of the frequently bellicose manner of Schroeder's electioneering, The Wall Street Journal recently reported that "Berlin's relationship with Washington is now so poor that analysts say the Bush administration has virtually written off Germany as a major partner in the near future."

Just as the campaign was drawing to a conclusion, Schroeder's Justice Minister, Herta Daeubler-Gmelin, further ignited simmering American sensibilities by comparing George W. Bush to Adolf Hitler.

Schroeder's electioneering put him squarely at odds with the entire western world, all of which is at least willing to confront Saddam under the authority of a UN-sanctioned resolution.

With the campaign concluded, observers will be watching Schroeder to see if he will come down from the high anti-American perch on which he placed himself and his government. If he does, it will speak ill of him as a sincere, trustworthy person. If he does not, it will speak ill of him as a sincere, trustworthy ally. Either way, the western world and certainly the United States, will now look upon Gerhard Schroeder, and perhaps even the German electorate, in a new, clearer, starker light.

In Washington, some senators, speaking with the regular roster of Sunday morning political pundits, strongly suggested that Israel ought not to retaliate against Saddam if struck by the Iraqi tyrant.

"If Israel responded to an attack, no Muslim nation... could support the U.S. effort against Iraq, even behind the scenes," Senator Joseph Biden, chair of the senate's foreign relations committee, said.

American policy-makers, just as they did 10 years ago, are once again asking Israel to forfeit its inherent right of self-defence.

"Any retaliation by the Israelis...," said Senator Richard Shelby, ranking Republican on the senate intelligence committee, "would be perceived as fighting side-by-side with the Israelis against all Arab interests, and the war could spread."

The senators could not have been less subtle. They were pressuring Israel, in effect, to let Saddam strike its people at will. Does anyone doubt he will try to do precisely that if he believes the end of his hold on power is imminent?

It is inconceivable that Israel should be expected to assuage the sensibilities of nations who, for the most part, want to see the Jewish state eliminated. It is inconceivable that Israel should be expected, in effect, to confer on those very same nations, a veto over its own right to act in its self-defence.

In Ramallah, Neil MacDonald of the CBC once again demonstrated Sunday night his one-sided, anti-Israel reportage, constantly infusing his personal biases into what should be objective, or at least attempted objective, on-the-scene news reporting.

"Israel's prime minister believes that peacemaking is best done at gunpoint," MacDonald offered early in the report, his voice dripping with his poisonous sarcasm, his personal disdain for Ariel Sharon evident with every word.

Not only was MacDonald's statement obviously an opinion and not fact, it was completely untrue. Sharon has stated repeatedly that he would never negotiate with the PA under the threat of terror, never sit down with them at the point of a gun.

The IDF was not "peacemaking" in Ramallah; it was trying to rout out terrorists. But the truth was irrelevant to MacDonald, just as the context for the IDF's presence in Ramallah, namely, the preceding day's Palestinian terrorist strikes, was also irrelevant for him.

Our taxpayer dollars underwrite his blatant anti-Israel propaganda. As the Canada-Israel Committee has often pointed out, it is well past time that taxpayers voice our displeasure with such unconscionable behaviour.

Dormant bank accounts may hold hidden treasures

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Some two dozen current and defunct Jewish organizations may claim long-forgotten money being held in dormant bank accounts across the country.

They are listed on the Bank of Canada's searchable Web site at http://ucbswww.bank-banque-canada.ca/. The site allows anyone to find out whether they have funds in a dormant account waiting to be claimed.

The site lists thousands of individuals, organizations, schools and clubs. Searchers may type in a name or a word, or even part of a name.

Included are instructions on how to make claims online, and who can make them.

Bank accounts which are untouched for 10 years are transferred to the Bank of Canada. The same goes for certified cheques, money orders, deposit receipts and bank drafts that are never cashed.

Dormant accounts of $500 and over stay at the Bank of Canada indefinitely. Anything under that becomes the property of the Receiver General after 20 years.

A CJN search turned up several Jewish groups with forgotten accounts. Among them are:

• Associated Hebrew Schools is listed as having $106.73 in a North York bank account, last accessed in 1982. The account is subject to prescription, or being taken over by the Receiver General, on Dec. 31 of this year.

• A listing of "Parent Associated Hebrew School," possibly the parents' association at the school, has a forgotten balance of $472.44, last accessed in 1989, at the Toronto Dominion Bank at 808 York Mills Rd.

• The United Israel Appeal is listed with a dormant balance of $639.54 at a Royal Bank of Canada in Saskatoon, unclaimed since 1989.

• The "Yiddish Drama Company" is listed with an unclaimed balance of $953.08 at the Royal Bank at 885 Sheppard Ave. W.

• The "United Synagogue Graduating Class" may claim $290.95, dating back to 1989, at the Bank of Nova Scotia, 2901 Bayview Ave., North York.

• The National Council of Jewish Women in Nepean, Ont. has $205.18 waiting to be claimed at a Bank of Nova Scotia in the Ottawa suburb.

• The "Toronto Jewish Soccer Club" has an unclaimed balance of $153.80, last accessed in 1987, at the Toronto Dominion Bank branch at Don Mills and York Mills.

• The "Willowdale Orthodox Jewish Congregation" may claim $136.89 at the Toronto Dominion Bank at 141 Adelaide St. W. in Toronto.

• "State of Israel Coupons" is shown with a balance of $206.93 at a Royal Bank branch in Saskatoon.

Other Jewish organizations with unclaimed accounts may be found at the site by using such keywords as Jewish, synagogue, B'nai Brith and Israel.

No deadline seen for Israeli troop withdrawal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Erez Weiner

Israel will remain in the Palestinian autonomous areas until terrorism is uprooted and Israelis feel safe again, an Israeli infantry commander suggested in a military briefing here recently.

Lieut.-Col. Erez Weiner told UJA Federation that Israel will not be bound by any deadlines to withdraw its forces from the West Bank.

That is the consensus in Israel, the commander of the Dochifat battalion said.

Weiner, who commands about 600 troops, has taken part in two major offensives in the West Bank since late March – Operation Determined Shield and Operation Determined Path. The objective of these operations was to stamp out Palestinian terrorism.

The function of his battalion – stationed in Ramallah, the site of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's headquarters – is to prevent terrorists from infiltrating Jerusalem and the settlements around it.

During sweeps into the Palestinian heartland, one soldier in his unit has been killed and 41 others have been wounded.

Expressing pride in his troops, he said: "They all know the importance of what they're doing – protecting Israel, their families and the Jewish nation... from crazy fanatics."

A fairly young man who wears a knitted kippah, Weiner described the current Palestinian terrorist campaign as Israel's "second war of independence."

"In 1948, we suffered attacks on our cities, and this is happening again," he observed.

Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon, which took place in May 2000, encouraged the Palestinians to launch their latest uprising, Weiner said.

"They were sure we were weak, like a fruit falling from a tree. But we've shown them, and ourselves, that we can collect ourselves together."

Israelis will be more than glad to lay down their arms, "but if we're attacked, we'll fight back. We'll show them we're unbeatable. The Romans are gone, but we're still here."

Weiner suggested that Israeli operations in the West Bank have been reasonably successful. "We've been able to stop almost all attacks." But he quickly added that the Israeli army must remain vigilant. "This terror, this evil, must be cut down."

The Palestinians may never love the Israelis, "but they'll learn to respect us."

According to Weiner, Israel has no desire to control or rule them. "We're in the [West Bank] because we have to be there."

If Israel does not respond forcefully to terrorism, the contagion will spread, he warned.

Israel is willing to give the Palestinians responsibility for their day-to-day affairs, but it insists on maintaining a security umbrella in the West Bank, Weiner said.

He said the Palestinians are beginning to realize that terrorism has not brought them tangible benefits.

Outlining a process whereby Israel can resume bilateral negotiations with the Palestinians, he said the first step is to win the war. Once terrorism has been crushed, Israel should seek out a credible partner.

"Eventually, we'll find the right partner," he said, dismissing Arafat as an interlocutor. "He's already part of history."

In Ramallah, Weiner disclosed, his troops found drugs and maps of Palestine without Israeli cities and towns.

And in Arafat's besieged compound, they stumbled upon guns, bombs and documents authorizing the Palestinian Authority to fund suicide bombers.

Weiner, whose Nachal brigade supervised Israel's unilateral pullout from the western part of south Lebanon, implied that the withdrawal had been a mistake.

"We retreated not because we lost, but because we weren't strong enough as a nation," he said, stating that public opinion had forced Israel out of Lebanon.

"I wasn't proud of our withdrawal."

Weiner predicted Lebanon will flare up again as Israel's major war front, since Israel will not tolerate Hezbollah attacks for much longer.

He also cast doubt on whether the fortified fence Israel is currently constructing along the length of the West Bank will be effective.

"Fences have never helped," he noted, referring to France's Maginot Line of fortifications built between 1929 and 1940 along the French-German border. "The best way to deter the enemy is to be strong. We're building a fence because it'll give people a sense of safety."

Sooner or later, he said, the Israeli army will have to smash the terrorist infrastructure in the Gaza Strip, adding that Israel has resisted doing so out of concern for casualties on both sides.

Weiner called a U.S. attack against Iraq a necessity, for Israel and the free world.

"This guy – Saddam Hussein – is a bad guy. Take him down when he's small, before he gets stronger."

Weiner acknowledged that Iraq poses less of a threat to Israel today than during the 1991 Gulf War, when it launched Scud missiles at Israeli cities.

Parents learn to 'let go' of kids who abuse

The following is the third in a series of articles on drug abuse in the Jewish community. All the names have been changed.

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Deborah is a pretty, dark-haired mother who doesn't know if she'll ever see her son alive again, but she believes she could probably find him somewhere on the city streets – in the area around Jarvis and Church.

Once a week, Deborah joins a group of eight or nine women who are either addicts or family members of addicts. They meet at JACS Place – a storefront at 858 Sheppard Ave. for Jewish alcoholics, chemically dependent persons and significant others. The women's group comes together for understanding and support.

Within the four lavender walls, anonymity is sacred so that the group can discuss their weekly experiences with honesty and candor.

Deborah knows there are probably no easy answers to why this has happened to her son and her family, or to what might happen next.

But right now, Deborah says she has to close the door to him if he tries to come home. Even if it means that the next phone call could be from the police telling her her son has been found dead.

He has to hit bottom, she says. Otherwise, he comes home only when he needs money to bail him out of a crisis and then he goes on to his next binge.

Because he is over 18, Deborah's son can sign himself out of every recovery program his parents find for him. They can't force him to stay and he doesn't seem interested in being cured.

Drug Abuse in the Jewish Community

"His addiction is destroying our family," Deborah says. "For too many years, I have had no time for my husband or my other children. My self-esteem was crushed, my dreams destroyed."

Deborah and the other women who meet regularly say JACS has offered them an anchor and a foundation to help them cope.

By talking among themselves, they have learned to look for patterns in the addicts' behaviours and in their own responses. They discuss issues that consume them, knowing their concerns will remain undisclosed to outsiders.

The women agree that it seems much harder for their men to speak openly about family problems.

Deborah says, for example, that her husband is still too angry to discuss the issues.

Lilly, an addict who has been clean for several years, says the regular support group meetings "help pierce through the shame that comes from community and personal denial

> The next call could be the last and the guilt that somehow we are to blame for our addictions or for the addicts in our lives."

The myth that "Jewish women are supposed to be better than everyone else means that when we suffer from problems, the fall is so much greater," she says.

Miriam is a petite woman who hardly looks her age. She currently has custody of her grandchildren.

"My daughter and her husband have lost everything – their business, their house, even their children," she says.

Miriam stopped bailing them out of their ongoing financial troubles recently because she believes that if she constantly helps them, they will never recover.

Her daughter ran away from home when she was 12 years old. The police found her and brought her back, but she then dropped out of high school and every other program her mother put her in.

While their daughter was growing up, Miriam and her husband didn't understand that drugs were consuming their child's life.

"We thought you either had good kids or bad kids, and since we believed we had a good kid we thought the problems would just go away with time," she says.

Last year, Miriam found drugs in her daughter's home and realized she had a big problem on her hands.

"My daughter now blames me for not helping her," Miriam says. But as hard as it is, Miriam is convinced that she can't answer her phone calls.

"My daughter needs to understand that she is powerless over the alcohol and drugs that are controlling her life. Otherwise she will never recover," Miriam says.

Joanne is a young adult who grew up with parents who were stoned most of the time.

"Everyone thought my mother was the ideal PTA mom," Joanne says. "She would pick me up from school and stop to chat with the other mothers."

But Joanne remembers that her parents would come home and close the door to their bedroom.

"We were left to bring ourselves up. There was no homework time or bedtime," she says.

Hypocrisy that catches one's breath

Last week, two Palestinian terrorists murdered seven Israelis and injured scores more. One of the terrorists struck in the very heart of Tel Aviv, the most populous of Israel's cities, at noon, the busiest, most congested time of the business day. It was not only to murder the largest number of people possible that the terrorist struck then and there, it was also to send the unmistakable signal to Israelis that terrorists can strike anywhere in the country, that no Israeli is safe.

As every other moral, self-respecting, democratic country would do in the same circumstances, Israel struck back at the body whose responsibility it was, and is, to prevent the attacks, in this case, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and its leader, Yasser Arafat. It laid siege to his compound, demanding he hand over a group of men suspected of involvement in terrorist actions against the Jewish state. With his refusal, Israel began methodically to demolish his compound.

It was not only to punish the PA for its duplicity, if not direct involvement, in the terror and for its cynical disregard of its duty to prevent terrorism against Israelis, that Israel struck at Arafat's compound. It was also to send the unmistakable signal to the Palestinian people that their leadership would be held accountable.

As of this writing, the destruction of the compound has ceased, but the wanted men have not been handed over, and thus the siege remains. Israel, however, has sent in food, medical supplies and clothing to Arafat and his minions.

Arafat was able to leave his confinement in Ramallah, Israel said, but would not be able to return.

Lest there be even the slightest doubt about Arafat's responsibility for and culpability regarding Palestinian terrorism, the following was reported Monday in Ha'aretz: "Arafat offered [to Egyptian and Jordanian interlocutors] to rein in the various armed groups responsible for terror attacks against Israeli civilians in exchange for an end to the IDF's siege of his Ramallah compound. PA officials who communicated with Jordanians said the proposal includes an undertaking by Arafat to restrain armed militants including Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the armed wings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad."

Whether Israel's actions have actually boosted Arafat more than they have Israel's ultimate security is a legitimate question for debate. But not legitimate is the question of Israel's right to strike at him. By his own words he has proven the justice of Israel's case. When it suits his purposes, Arafat is fully capable of "restrain[ing]... Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the armed wings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad." With the fate of his Ramallah headquarters hanging in the balance, it apparently now suits his purposes to do so.

Thus, the condemnations of Israel emanating from various quarters are not only unjustified, they are a hypocrisy that catches one's breath.

Rabbi corrects record

I would like to correct an error which I made in response to a question from Frances Kraft for the article "Intermarriage may preclude membership at shul" (CJN, Sept. 12), about intermarried couples and their membership in synagogues.

I stated incorrectly that Orthodox synagogues would accept a Jewish person as a member while not permitting the non-Jewish spouse to be a member. I had stated that this was the policy of our shul and many other Orthodox shuls. In fact, I was incorrect on both accounts: it is not the policy of our shul, nor is it the policy of any of the Orthodox shuls in Toronto with which I subsequently consulted.

The accurate position of these Orthodox shuls is that intermarried Jews are not permitted to be members of the shul.

What hurt the most

I recently went to the Toronto Centre for the Arts, where Benjamin Netanyahu was speaking to an audience about the current situation in Israel. I did not buy a ticket; I brought an Israeli flag. I stood outside the centre with about 100 pro-Israel lobbiers waving my flag, singing and chanting to demonstrate my unconditional support for the State of Israel. While hundreds of anti-Israel protesters were spitting at us, throwing bottles, hailing Hitler and chanting that six million Jews were not enough to die, I could not help but notice two Jewish women standing in the area assigned for anti-Israel protesters, holding a sign that read: "Jewish Women Against Israeli Terrorism."

I could handle the fact that 10 Arab teenagers promised to break my face after the demonstrations. I could also handle being spit upon. However to see two, so terribly misinformed, Jewish individuals call the IDF's actions "terrorism," now that hurt me.

More women needed

The idea of asking 20 respected Jewish leaders to write about books that influenced them was a good one (Rosh Hashanah Greetings Section, CJN, Sept. 5). But only three of the 20 leaders are women. This is extremely unbalanced and fails to represent the Jewish community as a whole. What message is The CJN sending to young Jewish women?

Claim against Claims Conference

Somebody finally spoke out, thank you! ("A Survivor's claim against the Claims Conference," CJN Rosh Hashanah Greetings Section, Sept. 5). I cannot tell you the physical and mental pain this is causing me 58 years after the Holocaust. I have just received my payment for slave labour. How many times have I called, applied, was sent to psychiatrists, and finally gave up claiming what was so rightly mine. The torture and the nightmares were just not worth it and I am not alone feeling this way.

The money that I received makes me feel ashamed of what the American Claims Conference is doing to us survivors. Not only did we live through horror, and survive, but we are constantly reminded that we are not in the right place at the right time to apply for the different funds distributed. We simply had to get on with our lives and turn our backs to this "blood money."

I trusted our own American Jewish negotiators to act on our behalf, and I am disappointed. Just to remember in the last year how many times I have called and broken down, crying hysterically because my questions were not understood and never satisfactorily answered.

I am one of the youngest survivors. How long do you want to delay this? This money is not even enough to purchase my headstone. So who do I thank for it?

I have learned that there is no justice in this world. Let's see if we can still right all the wrongs and give the few Holocaust survivors some better days for the remainder of their lives. We all deserve it.

Views were author's alone

In a recent article regarding the Claims Conference ("A Survivor's claim against the Claims Conference," CJN Rosh Hashanah Greetings Section, Sept. 5), reference was made to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and to myself.

I would like to clarify that the views expressed in that article were entirely the personal views of the writer.

Reflections on A.M. Klein's 30th yahrtzeit

A.M. Klein, considered one of the pre-eminent Jewish writers of the last century, died in August 1972. To mark his 30th yahrzeit, The CJN asked for submissions about Klein from two young writers who are exemplars of a new generation of Jewish Canadian talent and who both acknowledge a great debt to Klein. Here B. Glen Rotchin and Harold Heft are attempting to grapple with Klein's tragic silence and his unexpected withdrawal from the world.

Unwriting Myself

From The Imagined Journal of A.M. Klein
By B. Glen Rotchin
August 1951

To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee and not be silent.
O Lord my God, I will give thanks unto thee forever. –The Second Scroll

What more is there to say, and where exactly have I arrived? To praise God, is that the only thing to do? Then what of this scroll unrolled, come to an end, a stop, a period – truth be told – an emptiness, a silence. Worse still, a question: Either God is or is not. And not another praise, nor curse, nor word, nor punctuation will suffice to conjure His presence.

Bessie is in the living room typing the last of it. Her tac-tac-tacking behind the wall insults the quiet. It intrudes with a Morse code of desperation and helplessness, fills the cold night air along Querbes Avenue with the insistent SOSing of a sinking ship. Faces appear out of the bookshelf. I hear the quickly fading cries of ice-filled lungs, tongues swollen stiff. God, when will You arrive to free them? How shall they open their blue lips to sing Your praise?

What praise will do? I brought you music and poetry. Danced before you like King David turning shame to honour in Your name. Debased myself in some eyes, feeling lifted aloft on the wings of Divine egolessness. As I write this, Jerusalem quakes and the Ark of your new State totters, as it always has. I will not try to right it. Refuse to repeat well-known mistakes. How can I go on stumbling toward Your dream like a biblical ox?

I did Your bidding. Cursed the community its golden calves. Now I am weary, my mind is shattered like your famous Ten Words. O God reveal Yourself. My hiding place has always been the rock, a craggy formation of words. I have seen You pass, the back of your head. But it is not enough right now. Show Yourself, full-faced, panim el panim, let me know the secrets behind the words. Those secrets for which Akiva was martyred, stripped of his skin, layer from layer, his insides become outsides, the outer his inner-being, and he was indistinguishable from meaning itself, from Torah, from pure spirit. His torture was his liberation. You revealed Yourself before, to my predecessor, that Master of Letters, and now I ask the same for me. Even as we speak I can feel the parchment of myself peeling away, unscrolling.

Presently, I must admit the glory was not Yours, it was mine all along. The song was for myself, my own edification. The beauty I pursued was merely an investment on which I expected return. To see my words make a difference. To hear the hosannas of my peers. Thus was Your Name made profane.

Words are false, even the choicest, sweetest ones, mere illusions, constructions of how we want to appear, the mark we want to leave. But these can not matter. Only You are eternal. You stunned Job into silent awe, contrasting the narrow boundaries of his existence with the limitlessness of the universe. Suddenly, he realized the same unfathomable laws which govern the movements of nature are sovereign over Man. Reality is not the contest of tiny personal claims. It is a sweeping continuum, undeniable as it is unchangeable, fluid and shifting as tidal consciousness. What are we? Long-extinguished stars that appear as luminous traces of our own deaths. The ghost-writer is ghost. The poet is landscape.

If life is form then death is content. Could this be Your secret? The one exposed with the great Akiva's final revelation, his body opening like a many-petaled flower for the morning sun. Every creative act is simultaneously a death sentence. The artist seeks but one thing, the perfect unison of form and content. Enraptured by the sounds, smells, tastes and visions of the world, he delights in his corporeal self. He thinks corporeality equivalent to ultimate being and so idolizes the material. But no incarnation of material can fuse form and content in an unending embrace joining humankind with Divinity. Only in the denial of materiality can essence surface like a submerged bathescope. Only in the liquid buoyancy of transparent selflessness can the pure soul rise up to You in holiness.

And so every word I ever wrote is leaden, sinking – a stain, an ombre, every letter a shadow footprint on a snowy page. I have espoused, opined, editorialized, rhapsodized, mused, debated and analyzed with only one goal in mind, to shape a self, a somebody. But arguments are a fool's wardrobe. To think that one can create oneself from the costumes of idea – laughable. A trick of words does not touch reality. They are amusements, avoidances, diversions from the singular truth. These repulsive skins I have grown must go, must be shed. These disguises of selfhood I've spent a lifetime creating and justifying with cleverness and craft must be effaced.

There is only One question.
Either God is or is not.
I am not God.
God is.
And so I am not.

The bureau is swept clean. Two erasers sit on the corner like pebbles on a hardly visited headstone. There is also a saucer and teacup. Below the rim, a thin, brown horizon line where golden liquid evaporated to sky. Fingers reach for the handle's seraphic curl, a letter flourish, the outer curve of an ear. The hand and ear do not meet. They are held in time and space between being and not being. And this is where God sees fit to leave them. Suspended in grace.

The Poet Klein Editorializes

By Harold Heft

A.M. Klein reacts to Alexander Bercovitch's death in an editorial in the Canadian Jewish Chronicle.

I

Not even do the proven myths rise up today – there to crystallize phosphorescent around the fading sigil of his absence. Where are the lesser poets to fashion his hauntings out of the ashes or crypts or the dreams of daughters? I know all the words, they are mine to write.

But still,

under the too-gentle leanings of this mountain do every two snow flakes seem exactly alike today each falling along the same route as the last, softly uttering the same note,

falling in perfect symmetry beneath the next. Every pupil is saturated with familiarity.

II

I inhale repetition and settle beneath this new stretch of winter. I allow the earth-cloud to envelope the points of my body, to mould to the heavy darkness of my suit.

My gloved fingers
comb this temporary desert searching for the single unique jewel that fell yesterday. The jewel masquerading as snow flake, falling among us always too early, expressing too fragile a season, destined to melt instantly into the still-warm earth.

Or is it the sudden dark spot on the pavement evaporating an instant after impact? The weightless jewel for which guilty children in flight abandon the design of games to chase, ruddered by inarticulate tongues still young enough to know to hunger for the single original flake.

III

The truth is I have known such precious originals. There may be but one per season, sometimes less. They cling to their descent – most masterful divers – only so long as the wind will support. Call it partnership, uneven and binding. This one dreams dangerous landscapes ascending toward heaven, while the multitudes, together, breath the earthward winds.

This one, in falling, tilts into the light, freely reflecting colours beyond all spectrum, while others refuse to yield

even the colour green.

IV

The truth is
I knew this one. The [illegible]

I was tired of being only exactly what I am, an arranger of words. And so did the artist paint me – tired – broken down to the million elements and angles that is a life. A cheek,

they say, is only a cheek. But in the sweep of his brush this cheek was at once every second it had lived to surround my mouth, contain air and words and food, blood and veins and tissue. The few strands at the tip of his brush knew each kiss

this cheek had ever gladly accepted and each scrape of dull blade it had endured. And above the cheek rested my

copy of itself, perfectly of my life,

contained in my head and containing all vision and sight. But my right eye was for insight, gaping, roaming, lolling

exploding in its yearning to escape this tilted head. And there, beside me, a book, my own, and my wife, buoyant.

V

Crudely I asked if this face I saw was me, and the artist raged that it mattered not whose face it was, that

I now owned, after all, a Bercovitch! Still does that painting hang singular before me, mocking disintegration. Still does it present itself only in fragments

and each day a different fragment juts itself into my consciousness, surrounds me as my mind wades under it. In each particular does the whole of the artist's mind congeal like the memory of unformed marble around the rippling muscles of a flawless statue.

VI

And that is where the incomplete is exposed. The immortality we seek is in that which we take, not in what we leave behind. It is in the debt for marble chipped away, not in the value of the remaining statue. Still, from somewhere beyond this sameness of winter do vapours rise up, as from subterranean rivers,

and swim, undetected,

across the sky, seeking always purer forms of themselves, while we, together beneath his gifts, recline.

B. Glen Rotchin is a writer in Montreal and Harold Heft is a writer in Toronto.

Whence now?

I am writing this column on Sept. 10, one day before the anniversary of the unhappy events last year that changed our history so radically.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

A year ago, on Sept. 11, I found myself in Israel, on one of the kibbutzim on the northern border between Israel and Lebanon. There was a television set stationed near the entrance to the kibbutz and, as I stopped to see what was on the screen, I was shocked to see an airplane smash into the World Trade Center in New York City.

I suggested to my friends who were with me on my Israeli trip that I was witnessing a turning point in world history. Unfortunately, I was all too correct. The world has not been the same since.

I cannot let this day go by without remembering the past and trying to look to the future. Somehow I feel that before Sept. 11, 2001, we were all somewhat innocent about events in the world, but now that innocence has dissolved in the acid of reality.

In earlier days, there was still a sense of unlimited optimism and trust, but since then both have dissipated and fear has taken their place.

The majority of Canadians and Americans do not look at tomorrow with the kind of confidence that once was theirs.

We fear that what happened yesterday might happen again, and might be even worse. All guarantees have gone, and certainties have melted away. Times are more demanding of all of us, whether we are Jews or Gentiles.

Does this mean that the future is dark? Not necessarily. But it does mean that we have a special obligation to contribute to the commonweal and, especially, to help fortify the future of Israel and our people in general.

The time has passed when we could afford to stand aside and take a vacation from life. But this can no longer happen. We are all together in a boat that is threatening to sink, and none of us can afford to disregard the challenges that lie before all of us.

Those who stand aside when they can help us are traitors to the common fate. That is a strong statement, but I know of no other way of conveying to my readers the urgency I feel about our standing together and pooling our forces to secure a better and more hopeful tomorrow.

We cannot leave this task to others without contributing something in effort, money, time and prayer. It is as complicated and, at the same time, as simple as that.

What are we thinking?

Will Rogers, a folksy American comedian and wry commentator on the foibles of humanity, began his routine with "All I know is just what I read in the papers" and went on to skewer what he had read. Well, I read in the Sept. 7 Globe and Mail that a majority of Canadians think the United States is at least partly to blame for Sept. 11 because of its own foreign policy.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

To be exact, 15 per cent felt the United States bears all of the responsibility and 69 per cent felt it bears some responsibility for the kamikaze terror. This fact – if it is a fact – is not just shocking, it's horrific. That 84 per cent of Canadians feel that something the U.S. government did justifies the murder of more than 3,000 people by lethally deluded nutbars is too ugly to bear.

But there's more. The first paragraph of the Globe article reads: "A vast majority of Canadians believe the United States bears at least some responsibility for the Sept. 11 attacks because of U.S. policies in the Middle East and around the globe, according to a Globe and Mail/CTV poll" (italics mine).

What is one to think? That Canadians came to this conclusion because they weren't thinking about support for dictators, but about the United States' defiant support for Israel? But wait. Turn the page and see the exact wording of the question asked of 1,003 Canadians:

"How much responsibility do you think the Unites States, with its policies and actions, bears for the terrorist attacks on them?"

Missing from this question: the words "in the Middle East and around the globe." Why not give people a choice? A question such as "Which countries were responsible for the terrorist attacks" may have elicited a totally different response.

So what did I read in the papers?

I read that Canadians still do not get it. Somehow a smugness has settled on us – the idea that "We are always even-handed, never favouring one side (Israel?) over another," or "We are not warmongers, only those guys down south, who got what they deserved."

I also read that the Globe and Mail may be shading its reporting so that what is said is not quite what is reported. The question does not include the Middle East, but the Globe report does. Was there another question asked later? Can the Globe see into the minds of the respondents?

It is a sad day for Canada if 84 per cent of its citizens believe that U.S. policies, however much we may disagree with them in their particulars, justified the joyous murder of innocents – and that no attention should be paid to the millions across the world who actually celebrated that holocaust in the sky.

What are we thinking? Are we angry at U.S. support for Saudi Arabia, the obvious backstage villain in this absurd theatre of slaughter? Or was it a bad day for softwood lumber? Are we so deluded by the Rick Salutins and Naomi Kleins of this country that we cannot recognize when an action is evil in and of itself? Are we again blaming the victim? Have we lost sight of the cruel nature of regimes that propagate hatred rather than light?

We can criticize the American government for its policies that coddle dictators of the most monstrous kind, or for not reacting to the spread of distorted Islamic doctrines. But Canada, no less than the United States, stands guilty of sitting on its hands when it comes to outspoken denunciation of such regimes.

Yet with all this, we strive to make our children merciful people. To make them literate. To show them the strengths and weaknesses of our system. To speak out when we fail, and to support the good in all of us.

The wicked are not so. And there is wickedness abroad. We must say so – and stoutly resist the seemingly eternal urge to blame the victim. After all, that was the technique of the Nazis. Are we to adopt their stance?

On Sept. 11, did a war kill thousands of soldiers, fighting on equal ground? No indeed, these were thousands of civilians murdered. If we are to assign blame, let it be where such blind hatred is nourished, in newspapers, classrooms, homes, secret cells and minds twisted by fanaticism. That is where the responsibility lies.

Averting the severe decree

On the High Holy Days, the Machzor tells us that we can "avert the severe decree" through tshuvah (repentance), tefillah (prayer) and tzedakah (charity).

Some would say that tzedekah really means charitable acts or righteous deeds. Technically, that's true. Functionally, though, it's come to mean giving money to registered charities. If it truly meant righteous deeds, next year on Yom Kippur, I'd like to fold over a tab on a pledge card that would commit me to a certain number of hours of community service instead of a certain dollar amount.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Don't get me wrong. I believe in giving money to worthy organizations. Every Friday night, my wife and I ask our three-year-old daughter to drop a coin in her tzedakah box. When it's full, we let her help decide where it will be donated. (Knowing how sophisticated children are these days, little Cari will probably have questions about how to maximize her tax advantage and how she might claim her one-year-old brother Noah as a dependant.)

As much as I believe in giving to charitable organizations, though, I despise the pressure I feel at this time of year about giving. And more than that, I dislike giving automatically to some organization because I gave last year.

I never liked the fact that my former shul pitched me on the High Holy Days. Sure, I folded over a tab on the card in time for the usher to pick it up in order to avoid the embarrassment of not folding over a tab while hundreds looked on. But I felt like a hostage. I didn't feel good about the giving. I felt that making the appeal for funds in shul on the holiest day of the year was opportunistic and that it cheapened the act of giving. I felt like I had no choice but to give.

(I have a childhood memory of my late father begging me not to play with the pledge card, lest I accidentally or mischievously commit him to an unaffordable gift to the JNF.)

I always thought that synagogues should do a better job attracting people throughout the year and then make the appeal for funds on Hoshanah Rabah or Rosh Chodesh Iyar. I suspect that idea wouldn't fly, though.

Next best from my perspective would be credible, meaningful appeals by mail. I changed my mind this afternoon, though, when a local synagogue (not ours) sent a beautiful, albeit unsolicited, calendar to our home. The envelope included a letter from the rabbi asking us to consider sponsoring the calendar for $12. The envelope also included an invoice indicating that we now had a balance of $12 owing to the synagogue.

That's a pretty full-service pitch. They asked us for money and then said yes on our behalf. Perhaps they've already paid it, too!

As for other Jewish giving, I am feeling my annual angst about the community's annual federation campaign. The campaign is underway; we haven't been called yet, but we likely will be by the time you read this. I should declare that I served as the local federation's marketing and communications director for a year and a half, ending two years ago, and was an active volunteer with the federation's predecessor organization. I do believe in a central, annual operational campaign. But I will confess that my wife and I have been giving less generously than we have in the past and likely won't be increasing our gift this year.

What we will do is take a much closer look at other charities, Jewish and otherwise, who may not have the resources to find us or pitch us. We've decided that we want to gain control of our giving and learn more about our giving options. We want to feel as if we're really making a difference. We want to give the modest amount we can afford to charities to accomplish as much as possible.

Giving money to charity should be an extremely conscious act, each time. It shouldn't be an annual, automatic, robotic gesture. If it's not sincere, if you're not truly present in the act of giving, have you really fulfilled the mitzvah? Are you "averting the severe decree" or just the canvasser's second phone call?

The Kirshner File

No sign in sight that intifadah is ending

By the bloody standards of the second Palestinian uprising, which enters its third year on Sept. 28, the past few weeks until last week had been relatively quiet. But on Sept. 18 and 19, the brittle lull was abruptly broken with back-to-back suicide bombings near Afula – the first such attacks since Aug. 5, when nine Israelis were killed in a bus near Safed – and in Tel Aviv. The latest bombings claimed the lives of seven more civilians.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Prior to these jarring events, Israelis had been subjected to a daily barrage of violent incidents, but the fatalities were minimal and, of course, there were no suicide bombings. From Aug. 5 to Aug. 18, Palestinians launched 17 mortar attacks, 19 grenade attacks, six missile attacks and 47 shootings, all directed at the Israeli military outposts in the territories.

During a two-week period up to mid-September, the mayhem continued, this in the face of a limited ceasefire in Bethlehem and Gaza in which Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had no faith. In the gravest incidents, two Israeli soldiers were killed in Gaza, a hotbed of Palestinian militancy; a Merkava tank, the pride of Israel's armoured corps, was ripped apart by a blast, the third such tank to be destroyed since the spring, and police foiled a plot to detonate a car bomb laden with 1,300 pounds of explosives. Meanwhile, Israeli helicopters strafed a bomb-making factory in Gaza and Israeli troops arrested and killed still more Palestinian terrorists in the West Bank.

As the Jewish High Holy Days approached, a Kassam rocket hit a home in the western Negev, mortar shells fell on Israeli settlements in Gaza, Palestinian gunmen fired at soldiers in Nablus and at civilians in Hebron and an Israeli force rumbled into Gaza yet again to conduct a search for suspected terrorists.

It is abundantly clear that the intifadah, which broke out after Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat rejected Israel's sweeping peace proposals at the Camp David summit, has not run its course. During the first six months of this year, 238 Israelis were killed and 1,935 were wounded in 1,071 attacks, a 90 per cent increase compared to 2001. As of last week, 619 Israelis and about 1,500 Palestinians had been killed in the fighting, which was ignited by Sharon's controversial visit to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, but which was actually inspired by Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon. A survey shows that 38 per cent of Israel's dead have been slain inside Israel (excluding all parts of Jerusalem), 35 per cent in the West Bank, 18 per cent in Jerusalem and nine per cent in Gaza.

By sharp contrast, the first intifadah, which lasted from 1987 to 1993, claimed the lives of 1,162 Palestinians and 174 Israelis.

The much higher casualties in the current intifadah stems from the fact that it often resembles a war rather than an insurrection. To crush the uprising, Israel has jettisoned its previous policy of restraint, and now deploys heavy military equipment, such as tanks and jets, to contain the Palestinians. In two major thrusts into the West Bank, Operation Defensive Shield and Operation Determined Path, Israel has reoccupied Palestinian towns, which had been ceded to the PA under the Oslo accords.

The Palestinians have also escalated the conflict, having transformed it into something of a people's war. But in the most significant change, they have rolled out a powerful weapon to which Israel does not have an effective answer – the suicide bomber. "Never in the history of the Arab-Israeli dispute has Israel faced such a complex and difficult problem as the suicide bombings," wrote Ze'ev Schiff in a recent piece in the newspaper Ha'aretz.

Suicide bombings, which began in 1994, a year after the Oslo process was unveiled and just months after U.S.-born Jewish settler Baruch Goldstein murdered 29 Palestinians in a Hebron rampage, have exacted a terrible physical and psychological price. Since January, 204 people have been killed in suicide attacks, more than twice the number in 2001. Although suicide bombings account for less than one per cent of all attacks, they have caused approximately half the casualties, from the Park Hotel Passover massacre in Netanya in March, which killed 29 people, to the bus bombing in northern Israel in June that left 17 Israelis dead.

Suicide attacks were initially the preserve of two Islamic fundamentalist groups, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which reject Israel's very existence and seek to create an Islamic state in historic Palestine. But of late, the secular Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an offshoot of Arafat's Fatah faction, also has turned to suicide bombings, which have struck deep into the heart of Israel.

As one observer succinctly observed, the suicide bombing has become the Palestinian version of a "smart" weapon, a strategic equalizer some Palestinians are simply unwilling to relinquish. "We don't have F-16s or Apache helicopters," Abdelaziz Rantisi, a Hamas spokesperson, said. "We believe this weapon creates a kind of balance…"

Polls suggest that suicide bombings have the support of most Palestinians and the majority of non-Palestinian Arabs. Such is the sentiment in the Arab world that even Naguid Mahfouz, the Egyptian Nobel laureate in literature who supports Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel, defends suicide bombers. As he put it in an interview with the New York Times on Sept. 14: "They are people defending a cause by sacrificing with their souls, and this is the highest level of noble resistance."

Suicide bombings have set back the prospects for peace, having hardened Jewish public opinion in Israel. Nearly two-thirds of Israeli Jews are in favour of a two-state solution within the context of a lasting peace agreement. But Israeli Jews have become increasingly suspicious of Palestinian intentions, which is hardly in the interests of the Palestinians, besieged by blockades and curfews.

Tapping into this sombre mood, Gen. Moshe Yaalon, the new chief of staff, declared that the current Palestinian leadership "does not recognize Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state and is trying to destroy Israel in stages." Yaalon, who is skeptical of the land-for-peace formula and thinks that the conflict with the Palestinians is far more serious than the possibility of an Iraqi strike on Israel in the event of a U.S. attack against Iraq, believes that the Israeli army can subdue the Palestinians militarily. It will be recalled that Dan Shomron, the chief of staff during the first uprising, ruled out the possibility of a military solution.

In addition, the suicide bombings have tarnished the image of the Palestinians – who have gained very little from the intifadah – and prompted the United States to call for a new Palestinian leadership. Concomitantly, the bombings have led to a more tolerant American attitude toward Israel's armed incursions into Palestinian towns. As a result, Washington has given Israel a virtually free hand to combat Palestinian terrorism, which the Bush administration appears to equate with global terrorism.

Cognizant of these developments, some Palestinian leaders have denounced suicide attacks as counterproductive. Sari Nusseibeh, the president of Al Quds University and the PA official in charge of Jerusalem affairs, circulated a petition last spring demanding a halt to the cult of suicide bombers. And in an amazing commentary, Abdel Razak Yehiyeh, the senior Palestinian security official who negotiated the Aug. 18 Gaza/ Bethlehem truce, has described the bombings as "murders for no reason" and as "a mistake from both a moral and a tactical point of view."

Last month, the PA tried to forge a united position on suicide attacks, but radical elements, from Hamas on down, rejected the proposal. Earlier this month, Arafat, who has lately come under unprecedented criticism from Palestinian parliamentarians, condemned "every act of terror against civilians" in Israel, but not in the territories.

Given the absence of an official Palestinian decision to formally outlaw suicide bombings, Israel's insistence that the Palestinians must lay down their arms before bilateral political talks can be renewed and Sharon's hard line on a permanent settlement, the chances of achieving a comprehensive and durable ceasefire are exceedingly slim.

Seeing no light at the end of the tunnel, Israel has begun to take extraordinary measures to combat the Palestinians – from building a fortified fence along the West Bank and razing the homes of bombers to exiling their families and stripping Israeli Arabs with direct ties to terrorists of their citizenship. And in another new twist, Israel is using the current show trial of Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti, accused of fomenting and organizing terrorism and defended by a Jewish lawyer, to discredit the present Palestinian leadership as led by Arafat.

Sharon, who absolutely refuses to deal with Arafat and compares him to Osama bin Laden, has excoriated the PA as "a gang of corrupt terrorists and assassins." The Palestinians have branded Sharon's government as "a coalition of terror and a gang of killers."

The bitter rhetoric suggests that the intifadah, despite war weariness on both sides, is still going strong, and that a semblance of peace is still a long way off.

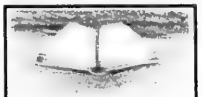
Honouring HaShem a little longer

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

The story is told of Rav Chaim of Brisk (as told by his grandson, Rav Soloveitchik, recorded in Pninei Harav) that the shul would honour Rav Chaim on Simchat Torah by giving him the Torah for the first hakafah, for the first dance around the bimah with the sefer Torah.

Now the Talmud says that one who is given the Torah to read and does not make the brachah is cursed. Rav Chaim understood this to mean that one who is given the Torah and gives it back is expressing lack of love and honour for the Torah – as if to say, "Thanks for the Torah but I don't want it" – and hence is cursed.

Well, Rav Chaim felt that this applied also to giving the Torah back after holding it for the hakafot. It would be a lack of respect to hand the Torah off to someone else – like saying, "I've had enough of the Torah, you take it." So he would never give the Torah away after his hakafah; he would wait for someone to take it from him.

Meanwhile, the people were reluctant to take the Torah from Rav Chaim, believing that he wanted to keep holding it. He would wait for them to take it, while they would wait for him to give it up when he was ready. On occasion, he would hold the Torah for the entire seven hakafot.

Simchat Torah is the holiday of love of the Torah. We dance with the Torah, we sing, we give honour to the Torah.

There are other customs that express this love of the Torah and reluctance to run away from it.

The halachah states that one is not permitted to run on Shabbat, except to run to shul or to learn. When you leave shul at the end of the services, you are not to take a giant step out of shul, as if to say I can't wait to get out of here, but rather should leave at a normal pace.

After an aliyah to the Torah, the person stands by the Torah while the next person has his aliyah and only after that aliyah does he step down from the bimah – as if to say, "I don't want to run away from the Torah, let me stay near it a bit longer."

Adon Olam at the end of the services on Shabbat expresses a similar feeling – "I will sit down for a moment at the end of the service, as if to say I am sorry it is over, I could stay here a bit longer."

Havdallah at the end of Shabbat is stretched a bit to express the reluctance to leave Shabbat, the desire to hold on a bit longer.

Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah are not only us singing our love of the Torah – the midrash says this is HaShem asking us to hang around just one more day, after all the holidays, to allow us to express to him that we part only with reluctance and for Him to tell us that it is also only with reluctance that he leaves us.

Chag Samayach.

The enigmatic figure who helped win WWII

Tuxedo Park*, by Jennet Conant
Simon & Schuster, 2002, $39.50

Books
Bernard Baskin

He helped win World War II and saved thousands of lives. He was honoured by U.S. president Harry Truman and British prime minister Winston Churchill. But I had never heard of him, and doubt if you have.

Alfred Lee Loomis was a many-sided and astonishing personality. Born into a prominent New York family, he rose quickly in the 1920s to become one of the most powerful figures in finance. Handsome, charismatic, and brilliant, he was one of the few major investors to pull his money out of the stock market before the crash of 1929. During the first few years of the Depression, Loomis became one of the richest men in America.

Yet, his true passion was science. In 1926, Loomis bought an abandoned stone mansion in Tuxedo Park about forty miles north of New York City. There he created a private scientific playground where he could pursue research in fields ranging from physics and chemistry to psychology, physiology, and biology. Tuxedo Park had been developed in the late 19th century as a private resort for New York's financial and social elite.

Regarded at first as an "eccentric dabbler," in time, through his passion for scientific investigation and his generosity, Loomis was able to cajole famous personalities to his well-stocked laboratory. These included Niels Bohr, Enrico Fermi and Albert Einstein.

In the 1930s, British scientists were at the cutting edge of radar technology. They fashioned the megnetron, a small copper disk that emitted short-wavelength pulses of extremely high power that could probe much farther and resolve details far finer than any previous system. With financial assistance from Loomis and the help of scientists at his radiation laboratory, more than 100 different radar systems were devised.

Loomis, who had more then his share of cars and yachts, purchased Hilton Head Island in South Carolina as his private game reserve.

By the spring of 1941, Loomis found himself pressed into service on another scientific front. A series of revolutionary discoveries in nuclear fission had American and British scientists whispering about the possibility of constructing a bomb of enormous power. Fearing that the Germans might already be ahead of them, they appealed to Loomis to spur the U. S. government into action. Working closely with influential fellow scientists, Loomis successfully prodded the government to proceed quickly with the development of the atomic bomb.

Unfortunately, Loomis's domestic life was not as harmonious as his scientific enterprises. His beautiful, high-strung wife was depressive and often ill. Loomis increasingly distanced himself from her and their three young sons.

His eventual divorce, in a more puritanical era than our own, led to social ostracism. He lived out his life in relative obscurity, hastened into oblivion by the intense desire for privacy that had always kept him out of the limelight.

The author, known for her magazine journalism, is the granddaughter of James Conant, the longtime president of Harvard University who was close to Loomis as a friend and colleague. Her account is continually engrossing. Long after the story is over, the elusive and enigmatic persona of Loomis lingers in memory.

Simchat Torah foods on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It doesn't have famous foods like latkes or blintzes or hamatashen. But on the final days of Sukkot and the holiday of Shmini Atzeret/Simchat Torah, we have some lovely things to eat. And the lack of Jewish superstar foods means inspired cooks have lots of room to create new and tasty traditions for these holidays. Today, we'll sample some old and new holiday foods.

This Friday, the seventh and final day of Sukkot, is called Hoshana Rabah. Hoshanah Rabah comes 10 days after Yom Kippur and shares some traditions with the Day of Atonement [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask208.htm#Q2]. The chazzan wears white and chants Yom Kippur prayer tunes. And in honour of both holidays, we eat kreplach, triangular pockets of dough with meat or other stuffing.

Actually we eat kreplach in honour of three holidays, Yom Kippur, Hoshanah Rabah and Purim. All three holidays share a common theme: atonement. Because of divine atonement, we were saved during the days of Mordechai and Esther. On Yom Kippur eve, we recite the Viddui – confession in expectation of our atonement. And "on Hoshanah Rabah we have high hopes that such atonement has been granted" [http://www.spiral.org.za/spipvt/sukkot.htm]. The Nishmas site says we eat kreplach because the meat symbolizes judgment, which is clothed in kindness (symbolized by the dough) [http://www.nishmas.org.il/minhagim/hoshraba.htm].

Now that you know the reason, you can take your pick of 13 kreplach recipes in the Jewish Food Archives, including beef, kasha, chicken liver and cheese [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/favindex.htm].

When Hoshanah Rabah ends, the holiday of Shmini Atzeret/Simchat Torah begins. During Simchat Torah, we complete – and restart – reading the Torah aloud in the synagogue.

The UAHC's Jewish Parent Page says you can learn a lovely lesson while baking a Simchat Torah Challah – with dough shaped like the Hebrew letters lamed and bet. The Web site explains that "the last word in Deuteronomy is Yisrael and the first word in Genesis is Breishit. If you take the final letter of Yisrael – the lamed – and the first letter of Breishit, the bet, and put them together, they spell leib in Yiddish and lev in Hebrew, which means heart. The midrash tells us that the Torah is the lev – the heart of the Jewish people" [http://www.uahcweb.org/educate/parent/0203.shtml].

The Jewish New Year Web site provides a suggested menu and recipes for an entire Simchat Torah meal. Start with Caribbean Fish followed by Spinach Salad, Roast in Apricot Sauce and Jerusalem Kugel, and top it off with Strawberry Rhubarb Pie [http://jewishnewyear.com/jewishnewyear.com/holidays/tishrei/4811].

Penny Eisenberg has these three suggestions for your Simchat Torah table: biscotchos (Sephardi Crunchy Orange Almond Cookies), Grilled Spiced Citrus Chicken Kebabs with Fruit and Orange Crèpe "Scrolls." To make a scroll, you "place two crèpes right next to each other on each plate, so that they look like Torah scrolls. Stick the slivers of orange rind into the top and bottom of each roll to look like the Torah poles" [http://www.pennyeisenberg.com/recipes/rec_index.html].

Joni Schockett says that Simchat Torah is a joyous holiday, particularly for kids – a time for them to sing, dance and even be called up to the Torah. She feels it is the perfect time to prepare some delicious treats that parents and kids can work on together. On the Schockett menu: Best-Ever Chicken Fingers, Carrot Raisin Pineapple & Almond Salad and Jumbo Apple Raisin Spice Cookies [http://shik.com/167].

All too soon, the holidays are over and you are faced what to do with your lulav and etrog [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask169.htm]. Many people don't simply throw a lulav in the garbage but place them on top of the synagogue's Torah ark. Others save them until Passover and place them in the fire while burning the chametz.

As for the etrog, don't throw it away. Eat it! Try recipes for Citron Cake, Etrog and even Candied Etrog Peel [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=SUKKOT]. Or if you'd prefer to drink it, try the recipe for "Etrog Vodka" [http://www.motleystew.com/recipe.asp?RID=191].

L'chaim! And have a happy (and tasty) holiday.

The creation of Israel did not change borders

MYTH:

The creation of the State of Israel in 1948 changed political and border arrangements between independent states that had existed for centuries.

FACT:

The boundaries of Middle East countries were arbitrarily fixed by the western powers after Turkey was defeated in World War I and the French and British mandates were set up. The areas allotted to Israel under the UN partition plan had all been under the control of the Ottomans, who had ruled Palestine from 1517 until 1917.

When Turkey was defeated in World War I, the French took over the area now known as Lebanon and Syria. The British assumed control of Palestine and Iraq. In 1926, the borders were redrawn and Lebanon was separated from Syria.

Britain installed the emir Faisal, who had been deposed by the French in Syria, as ruler of the new kingdom of Iraq. In 1922, the British created the emirate of Transjordan, which incorporated all of Palestine east of the Jordan River. This was done so that the emir Abdullah, whose family had been defeated in tribal warfare in the Arabian peninsula, would have a kingdom to rule. None of the countries that border Israel became independent until this century. Many other Arab nations became independent after Israel.

Statement on intermarriage

The following statement is presented by the Va'ad HaRabbanim of Toronto (the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of Toronto) in response to the article, "Intermarriage may preclude membership at shul," by Frances Kraft, CJN, Sept. 12.

Intermarriage poses the single greatest threat to the continuity of the Jewish people. Forty years ago, intermarriage was relatively unheard of. Today, to our pain and anguish, it has become commonplace.

We grieve for every Jew we lose to intermarriage. However, legitimating mixed marriages by granting synagogue membership has not, does not and will not stem the tide of assimilation.

It is a contradiction in terms to be a member of a Jewish congregation while at the same time choosing to marry out of the Jewish faith. Membership in a Jewish congregation requires that all members of the family are Jewish, according to the tenets of Torah and Halachah.

May this holy season in the Jewish calendar provide for a renewal of commitment on the part of all of the Jewish people. We pray that HaShem heal the breaches within our community, and that "the [wandering] children return to their borders."

Brampton shul hires permanent rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Nancy Morris, recently installed spiritual leader of Temple Har Tikvah in Brampton, is not a newcomer to the congregation.

As part of her placement at Leo Baeck Rabbinical College in London, England, she was a student rabbi at the temple for the past year.

Rabbi Morris, 40, grew up in the Reform movement in Montreal, where she had her bat mitzvah and confirmation at Temple Emanu-El.

She received a master's degree in Jewish studies at McGill University and then went on to law school.

"While at university, I looked at Judaism on an intellectual level, but while working briefly as a lawyer, I became more and more involved in the religion.

"I began to regret not attending rabbinical school. Now I feel I've done the right thing with my life," says Rabbi Morris, who was ordained in July.

She says that as one of the temple's first permanent rabbis, she is happy to give the congregants a sense of continuity.

For most of Har Tikvah's 25-year history, she says, the 50-family congregation has had a different student rabbi every year.

"As a student, for example, I performed a baby naming, and now I'll be here to watch that child grow.

"It will give the congregants a sense of confidence that they have a community with a long-term rabbi. They'll also have a profile in Brampton, which has a hugely ethnic and diverse community," she says.

She plans on running a number of multi-faith events in order to make other communities aware that there is a Jewish community in Brampton.

The congregation, which started as a group of close-knit families who wanted their own community in Brampton, "is incredibly devoted to the temple. Because there are so few people, there is a real family feeling."

Rabbi Nancy Morris

Many teachers at the Hebrew school are parents of students in the school, she says, "so they have a real investment in the school. They want the kids to get a positive feeling about Judaism."

During Rosh Hashanah services, for which they drew a "good crowd," she said, she talked about the idea of a family-oriented congregation.

"Har Tikvah already has a great basis for inclusiveness, but I would like us to become a beacon for other congregations. I want to see all types of families included in our congregation, so people will say 'Brampton is very inclusive.'

"I would like us to look outward and have other families join us. In Brampton alone, there are about 1,000 Jewish families. We need to reach out to those unaffiliated Jews who live here."

In addition to the two monthly Shabbat morning services, she plans to start a monthly Friday night family service, as well as adult discussions and adult Hebrew classes.

Har Tivkvah's youth group is an untapped resource, she says. "It's made up of a bunch of kids who are excited about doing things Jewish. I would like to see them putting together programs and leading services. They need to be kept involved so they'll stay with the temple.

"I don't want to unilaterally decide what is good for the congregation, however. I'm going to distribute a survey so members can tell me what they are looking for in a temple."

Drug abuse in the community

Eventually Joanne and her siblings were taken in by a relative until their mom went into recovery.

Today Joanne thinks she is a better person because of what she went through. But when she was little, she remembers going into the closet and just crying.

Anita is an addict who initially joined an Alcoholics Anonymous group that met in a church for support.

"But I felt so uncomfortable in a church. I couldn't go back," she says.

Leah, the wife of an addict, agrees. She says she could barely bring herself to JACS because she was afraid she might know someone.

On the other hand, Leah says she would never have gone into a non-Jewish place.

The hard part was coming in. Now, she relies on her weekly meetings.

"Counsellors have taught me that addiction, like cancer, is a disease; that there are steps that can be applied to help me deal with the sickness; and that overcoming denial is part of the solution," Leah says.

"This may not be the life I would have chosen for myself," she adds. "But no one ever said life would be easy."

legacy of life

Phil Granovsky 1921 – 1995

Behind every successful campaign is a tireless and determined leader. When it came to the welfare of world Jewry, few were quite as committed as Phil Granovsky.

"Phil was truly an exemplary leader," recalls Julie Koschitzky, who couldn't say no to her friend and mentor when he asked her to take over his post as World Chair of the Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees in 1992. "He was a great Jew who saw Israel and the rest of the Jewish world as an extension of his family. And he led not just with words, but he put his actions behind every campaign launch, whether in Toronto, in international leadership reunions, or even in the presence of prime ministers of Israel."

It was Phil who led the charge to bring planeloads of Jews to Israel from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union. It was Phil who negotiated land for Toronto's first community cemetery. It was Phil who actively promoted the concept of community ownership of the Canadian Jewish News. And it was always Phil who was one of the first to declare his gift to a UJA campaign or his commitment to a worthy cause.

"If Phil thought something was right, he did it and acted upon it and then everybody followed his example," says Koschitzky. "We all relied on him. He had a sharp mind, a very warm and generous heart, a good sense of humour, and tremendous vision."

If someone needed his help, Phil was there. Over the years, he headed up UJA campaigns, United Israel Appeal, Keren Hayesod, B'nai Brith's Wilson Heights Lodge and Adath Israel Synagogue, in addition to being a Board member of the Jewish Agency and United Way. He made more than 100 trips to Israel, where he met with everyone from mayors, presidents and prime ministers to sabras and new immigrants.

"Phil was his own guy," says his brother Irving, who runs Atlantic Packaging Products Ltd. "If he believed in something thoroughly, nothing stopped him."

True, it wasn't easy being a family man and running a successful business when the Jewish world kept calling on him for his wisdom and guidance. Phil's youngest daughter Maxine recalls their Toronto home being constantly abuzz with phone calls and parlour meetings, and she loved getting caught up in the excitement. Although her father was in poor health for most of his life, community work gave him tremendous energy, she says.

Phil Granovsky and sister Sia as children.

"The big motivating factor for my father was to help others," says Maxine. "He liked to question things – nothing was ever black and white. He liked to be in the thick of things and loved meeting people who made a difference. And he was a very bright man, so it was wonderful for him to have a part in shaping Israel. My love of Israel and my Jewish pride come from my parents."

Phil's wife Shirley admits she didn't know what she was getting herself into when she met a dashing young man at a summer resort for singles in Port Carling, Ont., in 1945. They were married a few months later, just as production began on a paper bag business called Atlantic Paper Products Ltd. started by Phil and his father. In 1960, Phil was enticed with the possibility of a business deal with a supermarket chain if he became chairman of UJA's Paper Division. He wanted the business so badly that he signed on – and the rest, as they say, is history.

Despite his long absences from home, Shirley supported Phil completely. Some of her fondest memories include flying with a planeload of Soviet Jews from Budapest to Israel – "I spoke Yiddish so I was the only one who could converse with them," she laughs – as well as the 1989 dedication of the Phil Granovsky Family Auditorium in the northern Israel community of Kiryat Shemona.

"Whatever Phil did it was for self-fulfillment, not for honour," she says. "The results gave him satisfaction." This is no better reflected than in the endowment Phil left to UJA Federation, the Philip and Shirley Granovsky Family Fund. This unrestricted fund shows Phil's incredible trust in the community, leaving decisions to UJA as to where the money is most needed at any given time. Phil's selfless legacy continues to help countless people in the community every single year.

29 missions...and counting

TORONTO - UJA Federation is sending three more solidarity missions to Israel next month, bringing the organization's total number of missions to 29 in the past 2 years.

Since October 2000, UJA Federation has sent more people to Israel to show their support and solidarity than any other North American community.

"We made the missions to Israel a central and integral part of UJA Federation's strategy in assisting Israel through its current crisis," says Ronnie Appleby, chair, along with Howard Sokolowski, of Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. "UJA Federation is not just about fundraising, but doing whatever we can to help Israel, and being there now is the best statement we can make," adds Appleby.

The way in which missions support Israel's citizens was clearly evident to mission participants.

"It's amazing how much I was thanked for being there by every Israeli I met. You don't realize how much your presence means to Israelis, until you go there," observes Ellen Richmond-Isakow, a recent participant on her first – but not last – UJA Mission.

As for Sharon Goelman and her husband, Louis, visiting Israel, as a show of support, recently took precedence over their original vacation plans.

"For my birthday, and our 40th wedding anniversary, my husband and I were going to go on a big trip somewhere, maybe even a cruise," says Goelman. "But I suddenly realized, 'how can we go any place but Israel where they need us right now?' That was it. We went on a UJA Mission before Pesach and it was an exhilarating, invigorating, incredible experience," adds Goelman.

From October 5 to 10, UJA's Special Gifts Solidarity Mission – chaired by Harvey and Barbara Naglie - will be exploring Israel's dedication to the security of its citizens and visiting the Israel Crisis Management Centre, which helps victims of terror.

From October 13 to 20, Canadian health-care providers will see how their Israeli colleagues deal with crisis on UJA's Medical-Dental Mission, chaired by Drs. Irv Gottesman, Howard Price, Brad Strauss, and Zion Sasson.

And the UJA Federation-Israel Bonds Solidarity Mission on October 20-24, chaired by Barry Zagdanski, Colin Lewis, Dodi Weill, and Paul Silvertown, will meet with Jerusalem mayor, Ehud Olmert, and help to comfort Israel's victims of terror.

The sky's the limit for Toronto YAD

TORONTO - UJA Federation's Young Leadership Network (ages 25 to 45) may have a new name, but it continues to lead the way in Toronto, and across Canada.

Chaired by Leanne Spier and Alison Himel, the Young Leadership Network is now known as the Young Adult Division, or "YAD," and the name change makes perfect sense.

YAD, in Hebrew, means "hand" and that's what the division is all about - a "hands-on" approach to making a difference.

Young people are becoming increasingly involved in the Jewish community locally and nationally, especially when they can assist Israel.

In fact, a new YAD project for a group of young adults from across Canada will provide them with more information and understanding of Israel's situation.

Hands On Toronto volunteers recently cooked breakfast for members of Toronto's homeless community.

The initiative will feature a monthly conference call, a three-day visit to Ottawa in November for a special seminar, Israel education, and meetings with government officials.

"YAD is a wonderful way for people who want to be proactive to get involved," says Himel. "There are so many things one can do to contribute, and it's a tremendous way to connect with others."

"Toronto YAD is definitely the leader"

"Toronto is clearly the largest growing Jewish community in Canada," says Brian Tanner, Chair, along with Jessica Cooperman, of YAD's Telethon Division.

"There are so many young, intelligent, successful professionals whose specific skills and talents we are benefiting from in terms of philanthropic activity. Whether they're lawyers, marketing professionals, doctors, or social workers, they all bring their unique skills to their area of interest," adds Tanner.

Leadership opportunities are plentiful through YAD, whether helping out with a one-time event, serving on a social planning or fundraising committee, or participating in an ongoing project with a community agency or charity.

Richard Diamond, immediate past chair of the National Young Leadership executive, feels that Toronto's potential is unlimited.

"Based on my travels around the world, it's clear that Toronto has the potential to be tops in Canada for young leadership development," says Diamond.

One of YAD's most successful programs is Hands on Toronto (HOT), through which young men and women take a proactive, "roll-up-the-sleeves" approach by, for example, painting the apartments of financially disadvantaged community members, and helping to feed the city's homeless.

Dr. Betty Gerstein, Chair, along with Michael Long, of YAD's Hands On Toronto initiative, has seen quite an evolution in Toronto's young leadership over the past few years.

"Toronto YAD is definitely the leader," says Gerstein. "We have the support of UJA Federation and its annual campaigns, we have gung-ho, highly motivated volunteers, and, of course, we have the incredible Toronto Jewish community behind us."

Wonder where The Lions are?

It's been a record-setting year for the Lion of Judah program.

The Lion of Judah has symbolized courage, strength and majesty in Jewish tradition. Today, the Lion of Judah pin symbolizes philanthropic leadership on behalf of Jews around the world.

Seventy new Lions – contributing a minimum of $5,000 to the annual UJA Federation Campaign - have come aboard since April when Serena Koschitzky and Ray Rubin assumed leadership of Toronto's Lion of Judah initiative.

Serena Koschitzky

Ray Rubin

"I came aboard because my husband and I have long supported UJA and the work it does. This year, I wanted to give my own gift like many other women who give on their own," says Karen Meyer, one of the new Lions.

Rubin attributes the Lion of Judah's tremendous success to the need for women to know they're improving the lives of Israelis in crisis.

"These women are responding to the crisis in Israel in a beautiful way," she says. "They're just digging in hard, and doing whatever they can. They want this opportunity to make a difference, and they've really stepped up to the plate."

Koschitzky agrees.

"These volunteers, and UJA in general, are what drive this initiative forward," says Koschitzky.

"We are very encouraged by the number of new Lions, and we're so happy that there will be a new generation of Lions down the road who will set a strong example for their children," adds Koschitzky.

The Lion of Judah Luncheon will be taking place on Tuesday, October 22, at the Four Seasons Hotel with guest speaker Captain Sharon Feingold, an IDF spokesperson.

Final campaign push begins with telethons

TORONTO - UJA Federation's latest round of Israel Emergency Campaign telethons between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur has added $500,000 to the campaign total.

The campaign now stands at nearly $56 million, with almost $19 million in new gifts designated for Israel's emergency needs: assistance to victims of terror, expanded security for pre-school children, and support for Israel's vulnerable.

With less than two months to go, the final campaign push is underway with volunteers calling thousands of donors whose gifts are still outstanding.

For Charles Ticker, the situation in Israel is serious enough that he decided to take part in his first UJA Federation telethon with daughters Joanna, 16, and Sari, 14, both students at CHAT.

The Tickers happened to volunteer at the September 11 telethon; a coincidence not lost on Charles.

Charles Ticker, along with daughters Sari, 14 (left), and Joanna, 16, (right) worked the September 11 UJA Federation Israel Emergency telethon.

"It was an amazing coincidence," says Ticker. "But when I thought about it, I figured what better way to honour the victims of September 11, than by helping Israel, which itself has been an ongoing victim of terror for two years," he says.

For three other CHAT students, participating in UJA telethons is a source of pride.

Melissa Levine, Emily Berkowitz, and Robyn Kirshenblatt, all 17 years old and in grade 12, have been attending telethons since they started high school.

For Kirshenblatt, the telethons take on a special significance.

"I have cousins in Israel, and they're just not happy," she says. "Because of the current situation, they have no freedom. They never go out at night. They know I work these telethons to help them, and all the people of Israel, and they're so honoured and happy to know that I care."

For Levine, what started out as a chore, is now a pleasure.

"In grade nine, I did this because I had to," she says. "Now, the older I get, and the more I understand what's really going on in Israel, the more I feel that I must do this – that we all should – because Israel really needs us."

Berkowitz feels that the people she calls all want to help, but some of them need "a bit of encouragement."

"It feels great to help everyone understand exactly what's going on in Israel," she says.

The next set of telethons is taking place October 15-17 and October 27. To register, please call Donna at 416-635-2883 ext. 320.

I am going to be called 'Mommy' again

A memorial marks where the Dolphinarium disco once stood.

By Natasha Mozgovia, Yedihot Ha'Haronot, 28.07.02 -

In the summer of 2001, pain over the loss of her 14-year-old daughter Masha, who was killed in the Dolphinarium disco suicide bomb attack, caused Olga Tagiltsav to lose the fetus she was carrying. After repeated tries, she managed to become pregnant again. Now, she's cradling a baby boy; her sadness is tinged with joy.

"I'm so happy," says Olga, her voice trembling. "It's amazing, this gift from heaven coming after such a difficult 14 months, when no-one called me 'mommy'. The graveyard silence that had pervaded my home since the day of the attack was unbearable. It pains me that Masha is not here with us, but I am inundated with joy. My heart is torn between pain and happiness. I wanted a girl, but I was afraid that every time I looked at her, I would see Masha. I'm glad it's a boy, and that, at long last, there will be someone to call me 'mommy'."

Today, despite her joy, Olga's heart is still uneasy. "I am afraid to look ahead," she admits sadly. "No-one in Israel has insurance, and it is impossible to make any plans. When we immigrated to Israel, I dreamed of becoming a grandmother, and here I am suddenly starting all over again. I'm afraid to think how this child of mine will grow up."

Every two weeks, she goes to visit her daughter's grave in the Netanya cemetery. "Up to now, I haven't been able to make peace with the fact that she's no longer with us. I speak to her every night, before I go to sleep. When my son is a little older, I'll tell him that he had a sister and how much she would have loved him.. I want to have another child – a girl. I'll call her something similar to Masha – Michelle."

UJA Federation kicks off new community initiative

Lt.Col. Erez Weiner, commander of an elite IDF unit, recently spoke at the home of Sandy and Lionel Waldman, at the invitation of Mark Waldman, vice chair of UJA Major Gifts Division. Weiner's appearance is the first in an ongoing initiative by UJA Federation to promote greater understanding of Israel's situation among Jews and non-Jews alike. Joining Weiner are (back row, L-R) Mark Waldman, Lt. Col. Erez Weiner, and Lionel Waldman, (front row, L-R) Elana Waldman, Tali Weiner, and Sandy Waldman.

thrill killing, but never discounted the possibility that it was a hate crime.

Tielsch was finally arrested in February, 2000 and charged with Rosenblum's slaying. His first trial ended with the jury deadlocked 11-1 for conviction. Another hearing also ended in a mistrial, this time, 10-2 for conviction. Last May, a third trial ended with the jury stalemated, 8-4 for acquittal.

Officials conceded that the time lapse, the credibility of the star witness and a parade of unsavory characters as witnesses made it difficult to convict Tielsch.

But in an unprecedented move, District Attorney Stephen Zappala, facing criticism for continuing his pursuit of Tielsch despite three mistrials, ordered a fourth trial. Eyebrows were raised, but legal scholars said there was nothing in the law to prevent another trial.

The prosecution streamlined its tactics, used fewer witnesses and ended the trial in six days, less than half the time of any of the three previous trials. Its main argument was that this was a murder motivated by hate. As Zappala put it, "Neil Rosenblum died because of his religion." He sought a first-degree murder conviction.

On Sept. 13, after deliberating for 21 hours over three days, the jury delivered its verdict: Tielsch, now 40, was found guilty of third-degree murder – not premeditated, but done with malice and recklessness.

"I was definitely relieved," Penina Rosenblum recalled in a measured tone. "It was a very long haul. We're grateful it's over and we're happy that justice was done."

The Rosenblum family has been asked to read a victim impact statement at Tielsch's sentencing, scheduled for Nov. 13. He faces up to 20 years in prison. (His lawyer plans to appeal).

"We're not out for blood," said Penina, "but we certainly feel he should be punished in a way that will be a deterrent. He took my son's life. It was practically unbearable to look at him."

The Rosenblums attended each trial. At the fourth, PowerPoint presentations enabled the prosecution to project grisly crime scene photographs on a large screen for the jury and spectators to see. So graphic were parts of the presentation that the couple had to leave the courtroom at times.

Asked whether the conviction has brought a measure of closure to the family, Penina Rosenblum smiles.

"Others have asked me that. You don't have closure over a loss of a son. When you lose a child, there's never closure."

Attending the trials was "very, very difficult. But you do what you have to do," she said with resignation. "We did it for him. Sometimes, what you have to do is not so easy. But you survive and go on."

There's also a sense of bashert – predestination – about all this.

For one, Neil's brother Elly wound up marrying Neil's widow's sister, Chaya, a year after the murder and the couple has seven children.

And Neil's young daughter, Bayla, is now 16, and lives with his widow, Manya, who remarried two years after the murder and lives in Passaic, N.J.

"Whatever is done is a design from above," Penina said. The murder has even strengthened the family's already unshakable faith. "We have emunah."

Penina even sees meaning in the 12-year delay between the first notice of Tielsch and his arrest.

"We assumed the case was closed. But I believe it was brought back to life again. It was meant so Neil shouldn't be forgotten."

These days, Arthur and Penina are enjoying their 29 grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. "It's a brachah" Penina said of the large brood. "But it doesn't compensate for the loss. We're blessed, but the emotion is still there."

Her son "was a tzaddik. After he was gone, we became aware of so many good deeds he did in his own quiet way."

Before she hands over a photograph of her murdered son, she slips it into a plastic pouch. "You see?" she smiles. "I'm still protecting him."

TURNING OUR TEENS ONTO JUDAISM

Mike Bernstein, Head of Geography at Thornlea Secondary School, introduced a unique course into the curriculum in 1984 entitled, "The Jewish Experience – A Cultural Geography of the Jewish People". Over the past 18 years, Mike has taught over 1000 Jewish Youth, 16-18 years of age ranging in Jewish background from absolutely nothing to completion of grade 11 at CHAT. Well over 90% of these students thoroughly enjoyed this course, many commenting each year that it totally changed their outlook on Judaism (in a positive way!). Mike will demonstrate how he manages to reach our youth by taking us through 4 of his most popular lessons:

1. "Hear O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One" - Does the God of the Jews really exist? Monday, October 7, 2002
2. Forget what you learned in Hebrew School – What is Judaism really all about? Monday, October 14, 2002
3. The Disappearing Diaspora – What's going on? Monday, October 21, 2002
4. Inter-dating and Inter-marriage - Is there anything more important than "falling in love"? Monday, October 28, 2002

All sessions begin at 8:00PM

This is a wonderful opportunity for parents and grandparents to learn how to relate to their children and grandchildren on these key Jewish issues. Bring your kids with you. Everyone welcome.

Former Ezrath Nashim leader to be honoured

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Renee Rubinstein, who served as president of the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital Ezrath Nashim in Jerusalem for more than 10 years, is being honoured by the organization at an upcoming concert and silent auction.

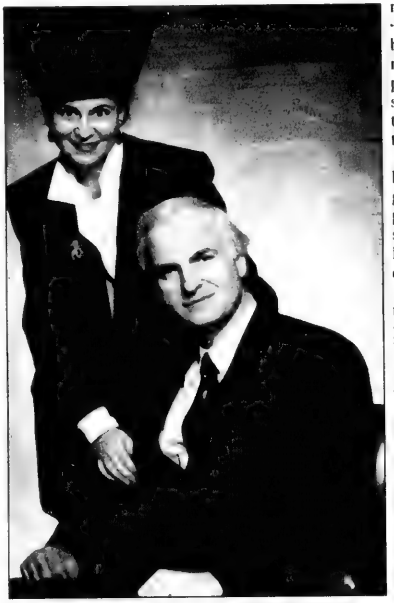
During her presidency, Rubinstein "was personally responsible for the growth of the chapter from a handful of volunteers to a viable organization which has made an invaluable contribution to the growth of the Herzog Hospital," says concert chair Riva Rotenberg.

The annual gala concert, which features violinist Moshe Hammer and the klezmer band Beyond the Pale, and the silent auction will be held Oct. 17 at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts.

The evening will also mark the establishment of the Eli and Renee Rubinstein Fund to Assist Israeli Victims of Terror at the Temmy and Albert Latner Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma at Herzog Hospital.

"Over the past year, Israelis have learned to live in a reality of terror and violence on a daily basis," Rubinstein says. "The recent increase in terrorist attacks and the number of their victims has affected every one of us."

Rubinstein cites a news release from Dr. Danny Brom, head of the Latner Institute, which stresses the need for the psychotrauma centre.



The Renee and Eli Rubinstein Fund to assist terrorist victims has been established at the psychotrauma centre at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

"Post-traumatic stress disorder is becoming a society-wide phenomenon in Israel. Much of the Israeli public is constantly bombarded by the sight of terror, violence and disaster through the media, which increases the effects of trauma," Brom writes.

Herzog Hospital has been a leading provider of psychiatric and geriatric services in Jerusalem for the past century. It is also a leading research centre in geriatrics, especially in Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases.

Jan Babins, executive director of the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital says that "Renee Rubinstein is being honoured for her years of dedication to Herzog Hospital and the Jewish communities of Toronto, New York and Jerusalem."

Rubinstein was born in New York City. She attended Brooklyn College and received a degree in English literature. She then worked in a nursing home as the head of recreation in New Jersey.

She came to Toronto 28 years ago after she married Eli Rubinstein, a professor of Jewish philosophy at the University of Toronto who later joined the family business H & R Developments and Property Management.

She has volunteered in a recreation program for seniors and is now a volunteer with the Meals on Wheels program at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"All my life I was interested in helping the elderly," Rubinstein says. "This is hands-on in meeting the elderly. Many of the people I see need a good word to give them a lift. I spend my time speaking to them about their families.

"I believe that I get more out of my volunteer work with older people than they do. Becoming involved with the Herzog Hospital combined my desire to be connected to the elderly and to help Israel at the same time – it was a good partnership."

Reflecting on her 10 years as president, Rubinstein commends former executive director of Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital Shula Robin as "my inspiration." She adds that it was Robin who thought of having an annual fund-raising concert. "And it's become a major event."

She also credits psychiatrist Dr. Stanley Greben, who worked to establish links with the Latner Centre.

"I admire his vision, intelligence and menschlichkeit," she says, adding that it was Greben who spearheaded the work for the treatment of psychotraumatic patients in Israel who are not funded by the government.

For more information on the gala concert and tribute to Rubinstein, write to the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital, 3101 Bathurst St., Suite 606, Toronto, Ont., M6A 2A6, or call 416-256-4222.

U of Calgary scholar studies Israeli civil society

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Keren, a visiting professor at the University of Calgary, has written "the forgotten story" of Israel's "civil society."

A civil society, explains the Tel Aviv University scholar, is one in which ordinary citizens and voluntary associations have room to express their concerns within the context of national politics.

"Israel has always been preoccupied with grand issues of national security," he says, "but this did not prevent the development of a civil society whose story is important and worth chronicling because it represents the ongoing effort by Israelis to live a civilized, democratic life amid imminent security constraints."

A political scientist, he decided to throw light on the complex relations between Israeli civil society and the state by writing a biography about the renowned civil rights lawyer Amnon Zichroni. Keren's book, Zichroni V State of Israel, was published this year by Lexington Books.

Zichroni's career, he observes, reflects the history of a country fighting for its survival while coping with such difficult questions as the legitimacy of conscientious objection and civil disobedience.

Citing examples, Keren mentioned the civil rights of Arabs and Jews, freedom of religion and of the press and the right of convicted spies and traitors to a fair trial.

Keren, in Calgary thanks to a Canada Research Chair in Communications, Culture and Civil Society, is the author of several books.

His first book was entitled Ben-Gurion and the Intellectuals: Power, Knowledge and Charisma (1983).

Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, believed that intellectuals should play a key role in building the new nation. "He expected writers to compose the epic of Jewish revival in the modern era, biblical scholars and archeologists to strengthen the ties between modern Israel and its ancient past and scientists to engage in defence-related projects."

Asked if, as some contend, Ben-Gurion was Israel's greatest leader, Keren replied: "His greatness in proclaiming the state, leading Israel to victory in the War of Independence and setting its governmental, industrial and educational foundations can hardly be questioned.

"To me, however, Israel's greatest prime minister was Ben-Gurion's successor, Levi Eshkol, who oversaw the transformation of Israel from an inward looking, collectivist, security-conscious state to an open, democratic, peace-seeking civil society."

Keren was formerly director of the Ben-Gurion Research Institute and Archives at Kibbutz Sde Boker, where Ben-Gurion lived out his final years and is buried. "I spent two years there going over Ben-Gurion's private papers, which include thousands of diary pages, hand-written letters, notes, speeches and other documents which serve as a main source for scholars working on Israeli history."

Keren's second book, The Pen and the Sword: Israeli Intellectuals and the Making of a Nation-State (1989), charted the decline of influence of intellectuals in Israel. "Today, writers, scholars and teachers are hardly influential at all," he said.

His third book, Professionals Against Populism: The Peres Government and Democracy (1995) is based on Shimon Peres' private papers. It is an analysis of his tenure as prime minister from 1984 to 1986. "I argued that the Oslo accords were, to a great extent, an outgrowth of Peres' special relations with Israel's technocratic elite."

Peres' second term in office, following Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995, was a pale imitation of his first term. "I believe by then the arena was already dominated by new elites objecting to his notion of Israel as a modern technological state living in peace with its neighbours."

Keren's fourth book, Political Literature in the Twentieth Century (1999), analyzed major novels such as Thomas Mann's The Magic Mountain and Franz Kafka's The Trial. His objective was to study the message of civility conveyed by those seminal novels.

His fifth book, History of Political Ideas, published last year, was a survey of Western and non-Western political theorists. "I attempt to introduce Israeli students to questions of right and wrong in politics that are not necessarily confined to any given place and time. The book's call not to abandon universal criteria of right and wrong under any circumstances indicates quite accurately where I stand politically."

Keren's latest book is International Intervention, which he co-edited with Don Sylvan. It deals with the moral and practical dilemmas facing countries intervening in states – Rwanda, Bosnia, Somalia – where atrocities have been committed.

Keren, the former chair of Tel Aviv University's department of political science, was at one point head of the Institute for the Study of Jewish Press and Communication, now known as the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Center for the Media and the Jewish People.

"The centre's main goal is to save the Jewish press, which has flourished since the 17th century, from oblivion."

In Calgary, Keren is working on several projects, notably a book about Canadian intellectuals.

"To me, Canada represents an interesting attempt to maintain a degree of civility in a world in which the term 'civility' itself has become a source of ridicule. I hope to explore some of the cultural roots that account for this attitude, as well as the contribution of Jewish intellectuals to Canadian political life."

He and his wife, Shlomit, an historian, have three children, all of whom live in Israel.

A graduate of Hebrew University and the University of Minnesota, Keren was born in Jerusalem in 1944. He served in the Israel Defence Forces from 1962 to 1965.

His parents, Hermann and Gerda Horn, were German Jews from the Rhineland and East Prussia, respectively. He was a medical doctor, as is Keren's brother, Yoav, while she worked in a medical clinic before becoming a homemaker.The couple immigrated to Palestine in 1933, the year Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor of Germany. In Palestine, they went through what Keren describes as "a hard adjustment process," but in time they became true Israelis.

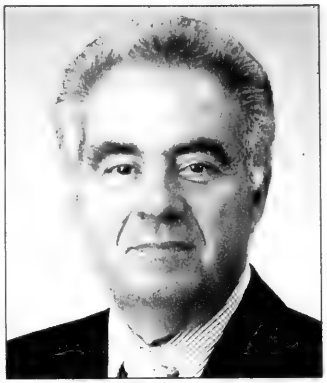
CIC chair Wilder rides the 'sea of change'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter



Joseph Wilder

WINNIPEG —When terrorists struck the United States on 9/11 last year, it was said the world had changed.

The complacency and frivolity of the Clinton years, it was argued, gave way to concerns about life and death issues.

As national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, Joseph Wilder noticed a similar "sea change" in Canada as well, particularly as it concerned the Jewish community.

Prior to the terrorist assault in America, the local Jewish community was burdened by "a tremendous apathy," he said. The ritualistic UN condemnations of Israel failed to galvanize the community and so, facing a path of least resistance, the Canadian government didn't get too exercised as well.

On campus, students were something of "a lost generation...ill-prepared to speak out (on the Mideast) and not as viscerally engaged as their parents."

That all changed on 9/11 and even before, with the onset of the Palestinian intifadah, Wilder believes. In an interview from his office in Winnipeg, Wilder reflected on the state of Canada-Israel relations and speculated on what lies ahead.

Wilder contends the Jewish community has, since the onset of the intifadah, become more aggressive in making its views known and has been given the resources by community fund-raisers to enable it to take a more proactive position. Its budget has jumped by 75 per cent and four new staffers have been added.

It has sought meetings with Canadian policy-makers, including Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and the two most recent Foreign Ministers, John Manley and Bill Graham, during which, "We have not minced words. We have frank conversations."

Canadian policy-makers have been greatly influenced by 9/11 and the U.S government's response to it. The U.S. view (shared by the CIC) that "terrorism is terrorism" whether perpetrated by Al Qaeda or groups headquartered in Palestinian territories, seems to have gained traction, he suggested, and Israel's plight, beset by repeated suicide bombings, seems to parallel the U.S. experience as well.

The result can be seen in Canadian policy, Wilder suggested: Graham was not averse to "pointing the finger" at Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat during a visit to the area, and telling him he must put an end to terrorism.

Canada has also moderated its pronouncements on the Middle East while its votes on UN Mideast resolutions have shifted to a position less critical of Israel

In light of the international war on terrorism and the suicide bombings besetting Israel, Wilder believes there has been more of an acceptance that "Israel had little choice but to deal with it in some way, to root it out."

In the wake of 9/11, Canada has also stopped talking about a "cycle of violence" in the Middle East and there has been less talk from government spokespeople of "moral equivalency" between the Israeli and Palestinian cases, though from the Jewish community's perspective, there is still room for improvement, he said.

(At the CIC's annual policy conference in March, Graham drew a round of boos when he criticized Israel for causing "innocent civilian casualties" that he said prejudiced the prospects of peace.)

In trying to be balanced and not offend Palestinians, Canada has not gone as far as it should in taking a stand against votes that are one-sidedly against Israel, Wilder stated.

But there has been an improvement. Where, a few years ago, Canada would have voted in favour of resolutions criticizing Israel while adding an "explanation of the vote," lately it has abstained. On Aug. 5, Wilder noted, Canada abstained "in a particularly putrid [General Assembly] resolution presented by the Arab bloc."

In a subsequent meeting with Graham, CIC pressed its point that "If you see evil, you can't turn away from it or abstain from it...We point out it's not even-handed to vote for a resolution that blames Israel for all the evils in the Middle East."

There have been bright spots in Canada's position vis-a-vis Israel, Wilder said.

At Durban two years ago and later at a meeting in Geneva of the UN Human Rights Commission, Canada stood up to blatant anti-Israel agitation. Canada, he said, "acquitted itself nobly."

A divergence of opinion on "settlements," which Canada views as illegal and an obstacle to peace but which the CIC views as the ancient patrimony of the Jewish people, remains, Wilder said.

Nevertheless, "I'm encouraged to believe Canada is a friend of Israel, and the Jewish community leadership has a relationship with the government that allows them to express their views at any time and Canada is open to being persuaded.

"Canada," he continued, "retains its long-standing core commitment to Israel's safety and security within recognized borders. Canada's support is rooted in fundamental moral values."

Chief admits police unprepared for Concordia riot

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal police chief Michel Sarrazin has reportedly conceded to the Jewish community that his department was unprepared for violent protest against Benjamin Netanyahu earlier this month at Concordia University.

At a closed-door meeting Sept. 13 with the Montreal Jewish Community Security Co-ordinating Committee (MJCSCC), Sarrazin said the police failed to properly evaluate the potential for violence in the demonstration against a Sept. 9 speech by the former Israeli prime minister, the MJCSCC announced in a statement.

Meeting held with Jewish community group

Sarrazin is also said to have told the committee that an internal investigation into the police response is underway and that an interim report was to be made public by last Friday.

Police are also reviewing tapes of the violence along Bishop Street and de Maisonneuve Boulevard and inside the Hall Building and there may be more arrests in addition to the five already made, the chief reportedly told the MJCSCC, a joint body of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada.

Sarrazin also reportedly said that an investigator has been assigned to work with the MJCSCC to look into reported acts of aggression against Jews during the demonstration.

A spokesperson for the Montreal police, Luc Belhumeur, confirmed that the meeting betweem Sarrazin and the MJCSCC took place, but would not disclose what was said.

Belhumeur said the police are not making any public comments about the Sept. 9 events at Concordia until "the analysis of the [police] operation" is released.

At the meeting, the security committee demanded an explanation for police actions the day of the violence and a "clear guarantee" that anyone who broke the law during the demonstration would be arrested.

"The demonstrators had announced weeks before that they would do anything they could to stop the former prime minister from speaking... The police did not properly secure a perimeter around the Concordia premises nor access to the Hall Building for event participants, despite having promised that it would do so in pre-event meetings with Hillel, our committee and other Jewish community leaders. The deplorable results were there for all to see," said group co-chair Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

Numerous Jewish students and other members of the community were punched, kicked, spat upon or intimidated as they sought to enter the building, the MJCSCC said.

"We won't rest until we know that those who violated the Criminal Code are charged with their crimes," said Rabbi Poupko's co-chair, Saulie Zajdel.

The group also hopes to meet with the RCMP and Concordia's security office to discuss their roles in the Sept. 9 events at the university.

Anyone with information about such incidents is urged by the group to report them in detail and without delay to either CJC or B'nai Brith.

Sara Ahronheim offered her eyewitness account of being caught up in the chaos. "To enter the [Hall] building, we had to make a giant circle around it to get to a supposedly safe entrance. We had to walk right through a volatile protest by hundreds of Palestinians and their supporters in keffiyahs, with flags, screaming vitriolic hate.

"Once having run this gauntlet, we waited patiently outside the Bishop Street entrance, held back at the gate by security and police. After about an hour, they started admitting us inside, but it was too late because a huge group of Palestinian demonstrators had appeared in our midst.

"I was fortunately right at the entrance, and as dozens of violent protesters pushed their way to the front, I tried to get through. Right next to me appeared the ringleader who tried to push his way in. The cop in front of me punched him in the face while pulling me through the gate at the same time."

Other Jews, she said, got stuck behind the gate and were "abused" by the demonstrators. After the riot squad entered the building to clear the demonstrators inside, they made those who had come to hear Netanyahu run for the auditorium, she said. "It was the scariest feeling because I knew these people wanted to hurt me and anyone who supports Israel or is Jewish."

After the speech was cancelled and the participants were allowed to leave the auditorium, Ahronheim said she herself once again face to face with the protesters on the other side of a barrier. "They threw bottles at people's heads, screamed hatred and tried to break the barriers down to hurt us. They started tossing pennies and coins at us, one of the oldest ways to taunt Jews by saying we are all money-grubbing."

She said the police did not intervene.

B'nai Brith is also encouraging students and professors with complaints about non-criminal behaviour to make them to the Concordia's Office of Rights and Responsibilities, or, in the case of the rest of the community, to the Quebec Human Rights Commission.

These complaints may refer to anti-Israel or anti-Semitic remarks, prevention of making use of the university, failure of the university to provide safety on campus, the participation of Concordia students or organizations in the riot, the stifling of free speech and dialogue or concerns about freedom of religion on campus.

B'nai Brith, Quebec region's director of advocacy Raphael Lallouz said this type of behaviour violates the university's code of conduct

He said B'nai Brith is also dismayed that the Concordia Student Union, which represents the school's undergraduates, passed a resolution offering legal and moral support to the students arrested at the protest, including possibly paying their legal costs.

"It just goes to show the bias of the CSU," said Lallouz. "They have sympathy for the aggressors, but turn a blind eye to the victims. Is paying legal costs within the mandate of the CSU?"

Meanwhile, the Christian Lebanese Coalition of Canada has denounced the "anti-democratic" demonstration, and is especially distressed by the flying of the Lebanese flag.

"This demonstration by no means represents the views of the Christian Lebanese, and we avidly denounce this deplorable use of the flag.

"Although we do not support... Netanyahu's policy, we denounce the Arab demonstrators' oppression of free speech. The oppression is parallel to that experienced in Lebanon today at the hands of Syria."

Concordia University rector comes under fire

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

An event intended to ease tensions at Concordia University turned into a strident finger-pointing session that largely blamed the administration and rector Frederick Lowy for provoking the violence that forced the cancellation of a speech by Benjamin Netanyahu.

Billed as a forum on "Free Speech, Tolerance and Diversity: Where do we go from here?," it was convened by Lowy and Sabine Friesinger, president of the Concordia Student Union (CSU). It included panellists Samer Elatrash, representing the coalition that organized the Sept. 9 protest against Netanyahu, and Patrick Amar, president of Concordia Hillel, which invited the former Israeli prime minister to speak.

Speakers from the audience of 500 overwhelmingly criticized the administration for giving a platform to Netanyahu, whom most described as a war criminal and a hatemonger, surpassed in notoriety only by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

They said the successful attempt to block Netanyahu's appearance was a legitimate form of protest and not a violation of free speech. Many were also galled that the Asper Foundation had co-sponsored the Netanyahu event.

Lowy was repeatedly heckled and shouted down when he tried to explain the administration's position. He said the police, including the riot squad, were on duty from the outset because protesters were expected.

However, he said he never thought students would use "force and intimidation," including against those coming to hear Netanyahu.

Lowy said he did not personally witness the violence on the street and in the foyer of Concordia's Henry F. Hall building because he was inside the hall where Netanyahu was to speak, but he said many videotapes were made of the protest. He said he is awaiting a final report before deciding what action will be taken against the demonstrators.

"Many of the 29,000 students at Concordia are interested primarily in getting on with their studies. They appreciate that certain Palestinian and Jewish students are intensely interested in the Middle East, but a lot would like to see it debated in such a way as not to impact on them," said Lowy, defending the moratorium against Mideast-related events on campus that was instituted after Netanyahu's speech was cancelled.

Lowy said Netanyahu was allowed to come to Concordia because "Hillel invited him and we are not in the habit of censoring student groups." He acknowledged that he had the final word on letting the event go ahead.

Amar was also booed when he defended Hillel's decision to invite Netanyahu.

"Why did we want to bring Netanyahu here? The answer is because we can do it in a free society," he said. "The Canadian charter guarantees that, but I know most societies have nothing like that."

Amar said Netanyahu was never indicted nor charged with war crimes, to which Elatrash shot back: "Neither was [former U.S. secretary of state] Henry Kissinger or [the late Cambodian dictator] Pol Pot."

The forum, at which private security guards stood watch and bags were checked, took place Sept. 12 in the same hall where Netanyahu was to speak.

It replaced a speech by U.S. academic Norman Finkelstein, a controversial critic of Israel, who had been invited by the CSU. Finkelstein's talk was cancelled because of the moratorium on Mideast-related events.

"I hope this is the beginning of a process of talking to each other and understanding each other... so that we can move forward as a Concordia community," the CSU's Friesinger said at the start of the forum.

But the event turned into exactly what Friesinger said it was not supposed to be – namely a "trial" of what happened Sept. 9.

Elatrash said the ordering of riot police to clear out the demonstrators from inside the Hall building provoked the violence and was symptomatic of the "contempt" with which Arab and Muslim students are treated by the administration.

Elatrash, who is Palestinian, said he warned Concordia vice-rector Michael di Grappa before the demonstration that there would be "peaceful" protesters in the building's lobby and that he "couldn't say what would happen" if police were called in.

After the violence, Elatrash said, the administration has come to realize that Arab students can no longer be treated with contempt.

CBC elicits strong reactions

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two items this week:

1. On Newsworld's Politics with Don Newman, Sept. 12, Svend Robinson said, "It's interesting when we hear [U.S. President George W.] Bush's commitment to UN resolutions, saying we have got to respect UN Security Council resolutions. Whatever happened, for example, to the resolutions on the Occupied Territories, 242 and 338? Israel has ignored more UN resolutions, and yet apparently there's one standard for them and another for other countries."

Here we go again. During the Gulf War of 1991, Iraqi propaganda, supported by the Palestinians and others, including many in the West, made a similar baseless charge. It was not unexpected from these sources, and it is not surprising to hear it once again from Robinson. The problem is that Robinson's misinformation unfortunately gets picked up by unsuspecting consumers of news.

Put simply, no analogy exists between Iraq and Israel. Iraq, without provocation, invaded Kuwait in August 1990. The UN Security Council passed a series of resolutions demanding Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal and subsequent disarmament.

By contrast, in June 1967, Israel fought a war of self-defence against Arab states openly dedicated to its destruction and came into possession of territory it had no prior intention to seize. The Security Council passed Resolution 242, which recommended a framework for negotiating a just and lasting peace in the region. Resolution 338, passed after the Yom Kippur War in 1973, reinforced Resolution 242 and called on all the parties to negotiate immediately. At no point did 242 or 338 call for an unconditional or unilateral withdrawal from the territories.

Israel has all along complied with these resolutions. Largely unnoticed is the fact that, in abandoning negotiations at Camp David in 2000, and returning to violence and terrorism, the Palestinians, not Israel, have violated the terms of Resolutions 242 and 338. Are you listening, Svend?

2. On Sept. 15, Michael Enright, host of CBC Radio's Sunday Edition, noted the large amount of mail the station received in response to the feature interview with "moral philosopher" Ted Honderich the previous week (reported on in last week's column).

"It seems the last three minutes or so in our [25-minute] talk in which Honderich shared some of his views about Palestine and Israel made many people very unhappy and very angry," said Enright, who read a number of the letters.

But the issue is not the unhappiness or the anger of the listeners. Rather, it's about the CBC's responsibility to ask tough, probing questions, especially of its interview subjects such as Honderich, who announce themselves in advance through a book filled with highly controversial assertions bound to elicit strong reactions. In his recently published After the Terror, Honderich argues that Palestinian suicide terrorism is morally justifiable, but ignores (a) that Palestinians could have achieved statehood through agreed-upon negotiations and (b) that by "ending the occupation," many Palestinians mean the destruction of Israel. The CBC should not be surprised that its listeners would assume that any scholar who seeks to find a moral justification for Palestinian terrorism may be more interested in rationalizing the murder of Israelis than in seeing Palestinians achieve freedom.

CJC, ALLIANCE MEET: The leadership of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region, the president of Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the vice-chair of the Canada-Israel Committee met recently with members of the federal B.C. Canadian Alliance caucus to discuss Canada's role in the reformation of the Palestinian Authority, Canada's designation of terrorist groups, and anti-Semitism and intolerance in Canada. The CJC delegation raised the issue of Canada's role regarding Israel and the need to reform the Palestinian Authority (PA). The delgation told the MPs that the Palestinian leadership must be held accountable not only for terrorism but also for the deprivation and exploitation being experienced by the Palestinian people. Jewish student assaulted day after protest at Concordia University

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, is looking into an assault against a Jewish student at Concordia that allegedly took place on campus the day after violent protests forced the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

According to a report received by B'nai Brith, a Jewish male student was bloodied after being hit on the head with an unidentified object and kicked, allegedly by a member of the Muslim Students' Association (MSA).

The 29-year-old student, who has asked that his name not be made public, tore down a poster of the student group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights on the fourth floor of Concordia's downtown Hall Building around 6:30 p.m. on Sept. 10. He said he did so because of the moratorium on Middle East-related activities imposed by Concordia, which has been extended to at least mid-December.

B'nai Brith's director of advocacy Raphael Lallouz said the student reported that he fled when he saw the MSA member observing him, but was caught between the two doors at the Mackay Street exit to the Hall Building. There, the student alleges, he was smacked on the head, possibly with a cell phone, causing a cut, and kicked.

He then ran to the security desk of the Hall Building and waited until the police arrived and made an arrest.

Montreal police spokesperson Luc Belhumeur confirmed that a man involved in the incident was arrested for assault with a weapon. Belhumeur said the man's name is not being disclosed because he was released after promising to appear in court at a later date to face charges.

Teen scientist recognized for Alzheimer's research

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Eva Vertes apologized for being a few minutes late to an interview shortly before school ended for the summer. "We were just dissecting a pig in biology class, and we had to clean up."

Science is playing a big role in the the energetic 17-year old's life, and she can be forgiven for being a little overwhelmed. Vertes won first place at the Intel International Science Fair in Kentucky last May, which brought her $8,000 (US) in prize money, a laptop computer and a full scholarship to the University of Louisville.

The excitement doesn't end there: this summer she went to England after being selected for a month-long program at Warwick University with a group of talented young scientists from all over the world.

Vertes' winning science fair project tested whether a substance she had been using in a previous laboratory experiment could be used to inhibit brain-cell death in Alzheimer's patients.

"I've always been interested in neurological science, and Alzheimer's is a very important and relevant disease to work on," she explains. "From a scientific viewpoint, it is very complex, and from a social viewpoint, so many people in our aging population are being affected by it – not only the sufferers, but their families and caregivers."

She put together a research proposal and presented it to Dr. Michael Rathbone, head neurologist at Hamilton's Henderson Hospital and a professor in McMaster University's department of medicine. Vertes had to prove that, despite still being in high school, she had a worthy hypothesis and was willing to work with established scientists in a research lab.

Rathbone was impressed with her proposal and agreed to let her work on it at his lab.

On top of her high school workload, Vertes had to periodically rush to the university lab to check on her experiments – often during school hours. And because she has been so busy, Vertes hasn't had time to take driving lessons, so she either biked the mile from her house to Rathbone's lab or got a ride from her father who works from home.

While she admits that her school work dropped a few marks (from her 94 average), Vertes is not worried.

"I was learning so much outside of school," she says.

In addition to winning a prize at the science fair, Vertes saw her project become the subject of international interest. She is currently spending her last year of high school in Italy to continue her research with a team of Rathbone's colleagues at Universita de Annunzio in Chieti, outside of Rome, which has a strong medical department and lab to match.

She won't be skipping her school work, though: she is completing that – and her SAT tests – by correspondence during the year so that she can go to university next year. (She says she may not accept the University of Louisville scholarship, since she has her sights set on Stanford University in California.)

Eva Vertes

While understandably excited at how her life has changed in such a short time, Vertes has been most affected by the media attention. She has been interviewed by the national newspapers and CTV and was featured on a recent front cover of Maclean's magazine as part of a feature on 25 young Canadian leaders of tomorrow.

She has also appeared on a recent Global Television program about health.

Vertes speaks fondly of her family, to whom she is grateful for their encouragement and inspiration.

Her father Izzy is an architect and her mother Beata a real estate agent with a background in architecture.

But there has been only one other scientist in the family – Vertes' grandmother, after whom she is named.

"My grandmother was a chemist," she explains. "She was born in Hungary, and was a teenager during the Holocaust. At the age of 13, she was supposed to be deported to a death camp, and no one knows for sure what happened – whether the train driver was bribed, or if the rail was set in the wrong direction – but instead of Auschwitz, my grandmother went to a work camp, which she survived.

"Against all odds I'm here because of her."

Vertes identifies with her family hero, whom she resembles. "We have a photo of her as a child, and I looked just like she did at the same age."

Vertes' grandmother emigrated to Canada after the war, and went to work as a chemist and researcher at the Banting and Best Institute in Toronto.

"She knew Banting [who discovered insulin], and she worked with him in the same lab," Vertes says proudly.

Sadly, Vertes never met her family hero: her grandmother died of cancer eight years before Vertes was born. But her grandfather, a retired engineer, still lives in Toronto and has always been very encouraging of his granddaughter.

"He tells all his Hungarian friends about me," she laughs.

With her interest in neurological science strengthened by her project, Vertes' goal is to be a neurosurgeon or neurologist.

"And I still want to continue research," she adds.

David Frum kicks off Vancouver CJA campaign

By CARLA S. SHORE
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — U.S. President George W. Bush is a strong friend of Israel who understands that rewarding terror is wrong, a former insider in the Bush administration told the kickoff to the annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign here.

"[Bush] knows that you don't give the Palestinians a better deal now than was offered before the terror campaign began," said David Frum, a Canadian who has worked as a journalist and conservative political commentator in the United States since the late 1980s and served as a speechwriter for Bush from January 2001 to February 2002.

"Terror in the Middle East is a political tactic. Bush knows that you need to show these leaders that terrorism doesn't work to achieve their means, and if they don't see it, then we must remove their governments."

Frum was keynote speaker at the CJA event, held at Schara Tzedeck Synagogue the evening of Sept. 10.

The son of the late CBC journalist Barbara Frum began his talk by saluting the audience for showing courage in coming to a synagogue the night before the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. Speaking for nearly an hour, he offered an insider's knowledge of the war on terrorism from both a Jewish and a Canadian point of view.

"This [war on terrorism] is a new kind of war, but a real war all the same," Frum said. "This war tests not just fortitude and the ability to sacrifice, but also tests our moral courage."

The evening began with campaign co-chairs Bette-Jane Israels and Mitchell Gropper paying tribute to the campaign's many volunteers. A special commendation was given to Gordon Diamond and Louis Eisman, who headed last spring's Israel Now campaign, which surpassed its goal and raised $2.2 million to support Israeli terror victims.

The 2002 CJA Campaign hopes to raise $4.5 million, about 10 per cent more than last year. Israels said the increase is needed to cover the cost of inflation and recent cutbacks in provincial funding for social services. CJA funds Jewish community services in Greater Vancouver and services for Jews around the world.

Frum, who is working on a book about his time in the White House, said Bush believes the actions against terrorism in Afghanistan, the West Bank and Gaza, Iraq and Iran are all related.

"He is not moving on to a new front with Iraq," Frum said. Rather, in his threats to remove Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, Bush is continuing his war on terrorism in order to show people in the Middle East that terror will not get them what they want.

"Bush is a friend of Israel deserving of support," he said emphatically. Saying Jews need to start seeing friends in new places, Frum cited a poll that found Christian Republicans support Israel's stance against the Palestinians by a large majority.

After his speech, Frum answered questions from the audience, notably about Canada's role in the current Mideast situation.

Discussing the violent protest that greeted former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Concordia University the day before, Frum said Canadian leaders have not supported Israel to the extent that Bush has, and he suggested that Canadian Jews should rethink which political parties they back.

"This Canadian government is the most hostile to Israel that we've had since the 1950s," he said. "Yet their support in the Jewish community is unshaken."

The last question of the night came from a woman who expressed disagreement with America's "violent response to violence." In obvious agreement with Frum, the crowd twice booed her. In response to her comments, Frum asked: "What would the alternative be? responding with terror?"

Holiday Food Ideas

Try squash to accompany holiday meals

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Acorn squash is a good accompaniment to a holiday meal. Squash should be big, usually the bigger the better. It should be very dry, hard, difficult to cut and heavy for its size. Darker skin on the outside is good, and the darker it is on the inside, the sweeter it will be.

While cutting a squash might seem like more trouble than it's worth it's easier than you might think. The first thing to do is to get a big knife (I like a serrated one). You then cut the squash in half (lengthwise), scoop out the seeds (like a pumpkin) and place the open side down on a baking pan.

You can also use a small hand saw (no kidding) or a commercial pumpkin carver (yes there is such an item) or just poke some holes in the squash and bake it whole for about 20 to 30 minutes. Then take it out, cut the squash in half, scoop out the seeds, cut it into smaller pieces and continue baking. The best method for cooking your squash is to bake it in the oven at 375 to 400 degrees for 30 to 40 minutes, depending on how big it is and how much squash you have. You can always freeze any leftover cooked squash for use at another time.

SQUASH AND PASTA SOUP

8 oz. small pasta shells uncooked
2 medium acorn squash (about 1½ lb. each), split, peeled, seeded and quartered
2 tbsp. margarine
1 large onion, chopped
¼ tsp. ground mace or nutmeg
½ tsp. ground ginger
½ tsp. cinnamon
1 cup grated carrot
1½ tsp. brown sugar
6 cups chicken or vegetable broth

Cook squash in one inch of water in covered saucepan for 15 minutes, or until tender. Drain and cool. Mash the squash and add the margarine, onion, carrots, sugar, mace, ginger and cinnamon. Cover and simmer gently for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Cook until vegetables are tender. At this point, place some of the vegetable mixture in a blender or food processor and then, using 3 cups of the broth puree the soup (in several batches).

Return the pureed soup to the pot and add remaining three cups of broth. Bring the soup to a boil and add pasta. Cook, stirring occasionally, for 10 minutes, or until pasta is done. Serve hot.

Note: If soup is too thick you can thin it with additional chicken broth. Serves 4 to 6.

ACORN SQUASH WITH BEANS AND SAGE

1 tbsp. olive oil
2 large onions cut into ¼-inch dice
1 carrot, cut into ¼-inch dice
2 garlic cloves, crushed with garlic press
1 can (15 to 19 oz.) white kidney beans, rinsed and drained
¾ cup vegetable broth
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. coarsely ground black pepper
3 tsp. chopped fresh sage leaves
2 small acorn squash (about 12 oz. each)
1 medium tomato, cut into ¼-inch dice fresh sage sprigs for garnish grated Parmesan cheese (optional, see note)

In a large non-stick skillet, heat the oil over medium heat until it's hot. Add the onion, carrot and garlic, and cook for 15 minutes or until vegetables are tender and golden, stirring occasionally. Add the beans, broth, salt, pepper, and 2 tsp. chopped sage; heat to boiling then reduce heat and cover skillet and keep warm. Meanwhile, cut each squash lengthwise in half and remove seeds and strings. Place squash halves in a 3-quart microwave-safe baking dish.

Cover and cook in microwave oven on High 6 to 8 minutes or until squash is fork-tender (you can also cook the squash in the oven if you prefer). Place squash halves, cut side up, on platter.

Fill each half with one-fourth of bean mixture; sprinkle with diced tomato and remaining 1 teaspoon chopped sage. Garnish with sage sprigs. Serves 4.

Note: For a dairy option you can sprinkle grated Parmesan cheese over the top just before you serve the squash.

Alliance Atlantis exec defends Hitler mini-series

"By introducing [Hitler] through a new, younger look, it could make him a sympathetic character."

Kershaw, in the forward to his book, acknowledged that a biographical approach demands "a level of empathy with the subject that can easily slide over into sympathy, perhaps even hidden or partial admiration."

Fritz Stern, a professor emeritus of history at Columbia University, has observed: "It's an extraordinarily complicated subject. I wonder if it can be done so as to take account of the indispensable context or even to approximate even distantly its historical complexity."

And Michael Berenbaum, an American Holocaust scholar, has said that CBS is taking "a monumental gamble."

As he put it: "If the series shows us Hitler's humanity and makes him into a sympathetic character, it's a total outrage."

Sussman, who essentially conceived the series, explained that Alliance Atlantis would not have proceeded with it had it not been based on Kershaw's comprehensive biography.

"Kershaw is recognized as the mind, the authority, on the topic."

Peter Sussman

The series, he promised, will not depict Hitler in a sympathetic light.

"Of course not! The man was a f----r, but in the series he's not going to have fangs. That would be a mistake. Evil doesn't come with labels. Hitler was a human. He was not a reptile. It would be a mistake to keep that from the world."

Sussman, born and raised in a Conservative Jewish home in Toronto, said the series will portray Hitler's ascendancy within the context of a society crushed by Germany's ignominious defeat in World War I.

"Germany was ripe for this evil, Nazism, to be manifested. Deep-rooted anti-Semitism was bubbling under the surface."

He added, "Audiences should see why Hitler fooled a country."

Despite the controversy surrounding the series, Sussman noted, CBS is "very committed" to it.

"This is a very timely subject about how bad guys get into power, and how it affects the rest of the world," explained CBS president Leslie Moonves.

Sussman disclosed that a colleague broached the concept of a mini-series on Hitler.

"The actual word came out of someone else's mouth, but I jumped on the idea. I have always had an interest in, but not an obsession or fascination with, Hitler, one of the biggest motherf-----s of all time."

Sussman said the project interested Alliance Atlantis because of its longtime involvement with Jewish content subjects.

Citing several examples, he mentioned such mini-series as Nuremberg and Haven and the feature film Sunshine, all of which focused on the Holocaust.

Alliance Atlantic also made The Quarrel, a feature film based on a story by Yiddish novelist Chaim Grade.

Sussman said that two scripts for Hitler have been written.

The first draft laid out the basic chronology, while the second added texture and perspective.

"Hitler hasn't been cast, but we have a short list of actors."

PA, IDF meet over Ramallah standoff

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) cabinet minister Saeb Erekat met Monday with Israel Defence Forces (IDF) Brig-Gen. Eival Giladi about the standoff at PA President Yasser Arafat's besieged Ramallah compound, but Palestinians said they had no intention of turning over lists of the men holed up inside.

Conceding that the Bush administration is "certainly voicing concern" to Israel over the possibility that the IDF operation at Arafat's headquarters could hamper the administration's groundwork for an attack on Iraq, a senior aide to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday the siege at the battered Muqata compound will "unequivocally" continue until several dozen wanted Palestinians inside the compound surrender.

Meanwhile, elsewhere in Ramallah, Arafat deputy Abu Mazen met Fatah official Nabil Amr and other senior Palestinian officials, Israel Radio reported, calling the meeting "in effect, the rise of an alternative Palestinian leadership to Yasser Arafat, although none of the participants would acknowledge this."

> 'The rise of an alternative Palestinian leadership to Yasser Arafat'

It quoted Palestinian sources as saying the meetings were held with Israel's knowledge and consent. Although couched as talks on strengthening the Palestinian legislature, they focused on naming Abu Mazen as prime minister to share power with Arafat.

But the report also quoted other Palestinians as saying the group had no constituency and had aroused resentment within Fatah and the Palestinian leadership.

The Sharon aide, cabinet secretary Gideon Sa'ar, also said that Arafat could be allowed to leave his compound at once and move within the territories if the men were turned over. A number of Israeli cabinet ministers have demanded that if Arafat left the complex, he should be deported to a location outside the West Bank and Gaza.

U.S. officials declined to comment on a Ha'aretz report that the IDF halted the demolition of buildings inside the compound after U.S. pressure to calm the situation. U.S. President George W. Bush ignored a reporter's question about the account.

Israeli media said Monday that U.S. Ambassador to Israel Daniel Kurtzer had delivered a message about the siege to Sharon while he was a weekend guest at a sukkah on Sharon's Negev farm.

The reports quoted the message as saying that Operation Matter of Time, in which IDF bulldozers destroyed nearly all of Arafat's compound except for an area containing Arafat and the men, could disrupt U.S. efforts to build support for an attack on Iraq.

Asked about the sukkah conversation, Sa'ar told Army Radio that while he could not reveal details, he said "the Americans are certainly voicing concern" about possible consequences on the administration's groundwork for an attack on Iraq. "But if someone defined this as American pressure applied to Israel, this is simply not true."

By contrast, Sa'ar said, "During Operation Defensive Shield, when President Bush took the position that we must stop the operation, he said, with his own voice, stop the activity and get out of the [Palestinian] cities immediately.

"The official American announcements from the White House speak for themselves. They understand Israel's right to self-defence. They understand that the operations comes as a result of a terror offensive against Israel," he said.

"We have certainly not ended the operation in the sense we are still demanding that the wanted men barricaded within the compound be handed over."

Sa'ar confirmed that contacts were underway between the sides about a possible solution. "One of the reasons that Arafat is on the premises and doesn't come out is that he is defending the wanted men with his own body. Incidentally, he can come out of there at any moment. Not just at the end of the operation, he can also come out now."

Sa'ar said if Arafat left the compound, "the government would have to decide whether to allow him to return."

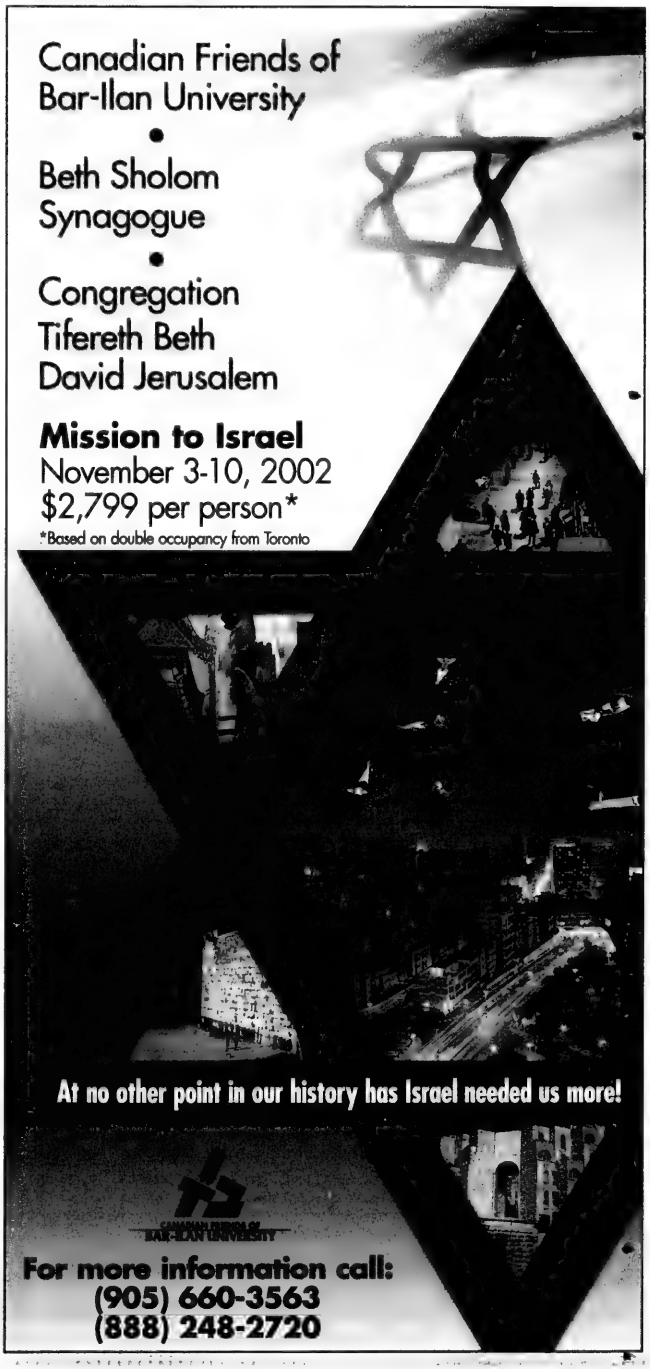
He indicated it would be unlikely that the cabinet would vote to allow Arafat to return, but "there is also the possibility of his going out into the area of the territories. He would not have to leave the borders of the state."

Meanwhile, a delegation of senior IDF officers headed to Washington earlier this week to brief the CIA on a Palestinian terror cell discovered in Israel that had undergone terrorist training at military camps in Iraq.

The cell's three members were sent to Israel to gather information but might have also had orders to carry out attacks. They were arrested after trying to return to the West Bank from Iraq. They belong to the Arab Liberation Front, a small group that receives orders from Iraq.

About one year ago, another Arab Liberation Front cell operating out of Ramallah was captured after planning an attack on Ben-Gurion International Airport. It seems the current group was also planning an attack on the airport.

Security sources say this is not the first time Iraq has been linked to Palestinian terror. In the past, Iraq has been known to be involved in it, in addition to funneling funds and equipment to Palestinian terror groups.



Al Qaeda tested chemical weapons

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A group of Al Qaeda activists conducted experiments with chemical weapons a few months ago in Kurdish northern Iraq, in an area controlled de facto by an extremist Islamic group known as Ansar al Islam.

It is doubtful that Saddam Hussein knew in advance about the experiments, but due to Ansar al Islam's close ties with conservative elements in Iran, Iraqi intelligence is making special efforts to penetrate the organization. While Iraqi agents may not have known of the experiments before they took place, they most certainly knew after the fact.

Commentary

Halbaja is the Kurdish town where Saddam Hussein's troops used chemical weapons to kill thousands because he believed they were helping Iran during the war between the two countries in the 1980s. It is in the same area where Ansar al Islam maintains de facto control.

It is not known if the experiments a few months ago included tests on living subjects, human or animal. Until the end of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, Al Qaeda experimented with chemical weapons in Afghanistan. The U.S. assault, however, scattered its experts, who were forced to find refuge in various places.

In addition to the question of where to conduct their experiments, the organization now faces the problem of where to store chemicals. Al Qaeda's effort to acquire chemical weapons is part of its plan to carry out surprise attacks on several targets and cause as many casualties as possible.

Al Qaeda perceives Iraq as a convenient place to work, because Saddam's government is not in full control of the entire country. Ansar al Islam has taken control of some sections of the northern area, defined as Kurdish.

Ansar al Islam is known to have close ties with Al Qaeda, as well as with the Iranians, who agreed to provide shelter to Al Qaeda operatives, including those responsible for the terrorist attack on the synagogue in Jerba, Tunisia, last April.

Meanwhile, Al Qaeda transferred chemical materials through Turkey, meant for use against American targets in Turkey or on their way to Chechnya to attack Russian targets.

MIAs missing two years

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — When three Israel Defence Forces soldiers – Omar Suwad, Adi Avitan and Benny Avraham – and businessman Elhanan Tannenbaum were kidnapped by the Hezbollah two years ago, the families of the Lebanese being held in Israel hoped that their loved ones would be exchanged for the Israeli captives.

But as there has been no sign of progress, the families have taken steps to revive their demand that their family members be returned home. Last week, some of the families held a protest rally, claiming that the government of Lebanon has been derelict in its efforts to return the prisoners.

"We raised our voices all the time, but now we are doing it with extra fervour because we can wait no longer," said Mohammed Safa, head of the Monitoring Committee for Support on the Issue of the Lebanese Prisoners in Israeli Prisons, in a telephone conversation from Beirut last Friday.

About a dozen Lebanese prisoners are being held in Israel, the committee estimates.

"In Israel they declared their three soldiers dead, and no one talks about the matter. The government of Lebanon is also not doing anything for the release of the Lebanese," Safa said.

Safa maintains that Israel must release the Lebanese prisoners it is holding, without any connection to the Israelis kidnapped by the Hezbollah, because its action contravenes the Geneva Conventions.

He has not criticized the Hezbollah's handling of the negotiations for the release of the prisoners, but reserved his criticism for the governments of Israel and Lebanon.

Safa said Lebanese Foreign Minister Mahmud Hamoud raised only the issue of the waters of the Wazzani during a meeting last week with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan in New York, and did not speak of the prisoners.

The families of the Lebanese prisoners decided to intensify their protests, Safa said, after they discovered that two years ago, Israel had agreed to have the Red Cross organize visits for family members to the prisoners in Israel, as a humanitarian gesture.

Ha'aretz has learned from informed sources that Israel agreed to visits by relatives of the Lebanese prisoners prior to the kidnapping of the three soldiers and Tannenbaum in October 2000. However, the sources said, Israel's offer was turned down by Salim Hoss, the Lebanese prime minister at the time.

According to the monitoring committee, its independent stance on the issue of the prisoners has resulted in a boycott on the part of the Lebanese press and a cut in funding from the government.

Terror victim donates kidney

By SHOSHANA KORDOVA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The family of Scottish terror victim Yoni Jesner is "happy and delighted" that one of Yoni's kidneys went to Yasmin Abu Ramila, an eight-year-old Arab girl, Ari Jesner, Yoni's eldest brother, said on behalf of the family earlier this week.

"The principle of saving a life is one of the greatest principles and values of Judaism and one of the greatest principles and values on which the State of Israel is based," said Ari Jesner, 26, at a press conference in Jerusalem.

"The fact that in this instance it was an Israeli Arab girl from east Jerusalem is of no consequence. Race, religion, culture, creed is not what's important here."

He added that the family's role extends only to deciding to donate the organs and that they had no role in deciding who receives them. Yoni's second kidney and pancreas went to a 33-year-old diabetic man, his liver went to a 54-year-old man, and both his corneas were donated as well. Approximately 1,000 Israelis are waiting for organ donations.

The decision to donate also reflects the life plans that last Thursday's suicide bus bombing in Tel Aviv prevented Yoni from fulfilling.

Yoni, who was spending a second year of study at Yeshivat Har Etzion in Gush Etzion, was planning to study medicine in London next year and then practise as a doctor in Israel, where "Arab and Jewish doctors work side by side, and nobody chooses the patients which they take care of," Ari Jesner said.

Sept. 16

• The Antiquities Authority donated some 150 books on Israeli archeology to the Archaeological Institute in Prague. The donation follows recent flooding that destroyed thousands of volumes at the institute.

Sept. 17

• The Israel Defence Forces raided Khan Yunis in Gaza, arrested 23 terror suspects, and destroyed nine workshops used to manufacture mortars and rockets. The army has been conducting almost nightly raids in Gaza searching for terrorists and munitions factories.

Sept. 18

• A police officer was killed in northern Israel and two others injured when they prevented a suicide bomber from striking.

• An Israeli, David Buchbut, 67, was killed and another wounded when Palestinians ambushed them near Ma'aleh Adumim.

Sept. 19

• Six people were killed and scores more injured when a suicide bomber attacked in the heart of downtown Tel Aviv. In response, the Cabinet decided to isolate Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat once again. Late Thursday and early Friday tanks surrounded the Ramallah compound.

Sept. 20

• A priceless 13th-century Bible was donated to Israel by an anonymous American benefactor. The book, written in Spain, is elaborately illuminated, similar to a handful of known Bibles from the same era also written in Spain's Castille province. Inside the book was a bill of sale for the Bible dated Tevet 10, 5048, which is Dec. 28, 1287 on the Gregorian calendar. According to the bill of sale, the transaction took place in Portugal.

Israel is still on top of something

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Newborns in Israel and Sweden are likely to live to the age of 60, according to the latest report on the UN human development index for 2000.

In both countries, just eight percent of people born will fail to make it to 60, compared to 12.8 per cent in the United States, the report says.

This survey ranks the countries of the world not only by economic production but also using data about health, education and society.

In the report, Israel is ranked in 22nd place – after Spain and before Hong Kong and Greece. By comparison Saudi Arabia is number 71.

But this ranking of Israel does not reflect all the data. The life expectancy figure is very significant. The place of Sweden is not surprising – it is a wealthy, established state with few immigrants and many welfare services.

But what is Israel, which is engaged in a constant war and where most of the inhabitants have come from miserable poverty, doing ranked at the top of the world?

In Israel, life expectancy at the time of birth is one of the highest in the world, and only a few countries are ahead of it.

Life expectancy is higher in Israel, afflicted as it is by terror and traffic accidents, than in Norway, the United States, Iceland, Finland, Britain, Denmark, Germany, Ireland and New Zealand.

The life expectancy for men in Israel is the third highest in the world after Japan and Iceland. Because life expectancy is a measure both of standard of living and health services, this finding is important.

Israel also excels on other measures. The rate of investment in research and development is 3.7 per cent of the GNP – the highest in the world. The proportion of economic activity by women compared to men is not as high as it is in the Scandinavian countries – the model of accelerated human development. But it is higher than in Switzerland, Austria, Ireland, Italy, Spain and the Benelux countries.

The number of cellular telephone subscribers was the 10th highest in the world in 2000, and today it is undoubtedly higher.

In several comparisons, Israel lags behind. On the Gini index of income inequality, Israel is in second place after the United States. In the gap between the highest decile and the lowest, it is in fourth place, after the United States, Australia and Britain – all of them, of course, before taxation and transfer payments.

Israel's educational achievements are impressive, but they are low considering the national investment in education, which is one of the highest in the world. (The survey measures only the proportion of students at the various educational stages).

The fertility rate for women is very high – the highest among the developed countries – and is influenced apparently by the birthrate in the haredi and religious Jewish sector and the Arab Muslim sector.

This is good or bad, depending on the world view of the observer. Its population is the youngest of all the industrialized countries, and this is clearly good.

Another report also puts us in a good spot – the corruption report of Transparency International has Israel in 16th place, above Ireland, Germany, Japan, Spain, France, Belgium and Italy.

This report is based on internal surveys in various countries performed by business people, academics and risk analysts. It also includes the differences between the most positive surveys and the worst of them.

In the worst of the surveys, Israel moves way up above Britain, Norway and Austria. Optimism expands and contracts alternately on reading these figures. It expands because Israel is clearly part of the advanced and progressive world; it contracts because you know that Israel's potential is greater and we could be in the top five or 10.

Israel has come as far as it has with a huge defence budget, a low rate of participation in the work force, and an enormous government budget. So what could it have achieved if it had made agreements with its neighbours with a resulting easing of the defence burden?

What if the proportion of adults in the work force here were the same as in developed western countries, and if the figure for public spending was not 51 per cent but 35 percent of GNP – the average in those countries? If this were the case, only the sky would be the limit.

Shin Bet foils poison plan

BY AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service recently foiled a plan by some Gazan Islamic Jihad activists to poison the drinking water at one of Jerusalem's hospitals, a charge sheet filed at the Erez Junction military court reveals.

The poisoner allegedly obtained an Israeli pass to enter the country for a medical examination at the hospital with the unwitting help of an Israeli Arab Knesset member.

According to the charge sheet, Iyad Hassan Mohammed Salame, 18, from the Bureij refugee camp in Gaza, had been involved in various attempted terror activities during the last two years. A few weeks before his arrest, he joined Islamic Jihad, whereupon he was immediately drafted to help with the poisoning mission by someone identified only as "Abu Mohammed" on the charge sheet.

The plan called for Salame to go to Jerusalem for treatment at the hospital's ophthalmology department. He was then supposed to drop the poison, made from a combination of baking powder and an unnamed liquid poison, into the hospital's drinking water reservoirs. In return, he would be paid NIS 300.

According to the charge sheet, Hadash MK Issam Makhoul helped Salame get the pass for his medical treatment. But the army says the MK acted out of humanitarian motives, having no idea of the alleged poisoning plot.

When Salame went to pick up the pass, the Shin Bet arrested him, foiling the plan.

This is not the first time Palestinian terror groups have apparently targeted a hospital: Last week, Ha'aretz reported that a Hamas cell from Jenin planned a suicide bombing at Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer. The bombers were driven to the Green Line, allegedly by a Jenin doctor, but the plan was aborted when the cell encountered a heavy military presence in the area.

A security source said that Palestinian terrorist groups are also showing increasing interest in the use of chemicals and poisons in their attacks. He cited the Cafe Rimon affair, in which three Arabs from East Jerusalem were arrested for plotting to poison the food in the popular Jerusalem restaurant.

But other security sources said the Rimon affair has been blown out of proportion. As a result of the extensive media reports, they added, Israeli restaurant owners are now afraid to hire Israeli Arabs – ignoring the fact that the Rimon workers were East Jerusalem residents, who are not Israeli citizens, rather than Israeli Arabs.

Jake Epstein plays Joey's stepson on Degrassi

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

This September, actor Jake Epstein is enrolled in two high schools – Earl Haig Secondary School in North York and television's Degrassi (Community School).

Jake joins the cast of CTV's Degrassi: The Next Generation when its second season begins Sept. 29. He plays student Craig Manning, the stepson of Joey Jeremiah (Pat Mastroianni), a graduate from the original Degrassi show.

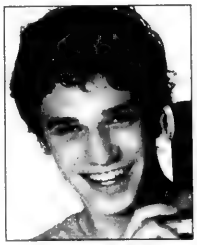
Craig's charm hides a dark inner life that includes his mother's death and abuse at the hands of his father. By comparison, Jake, 15, lives a normal life with his family. His father, Ian, is a lawyer; his mother is writer Kathy Kacer; and his older sister Gabi is a student and singer.

"Craig has an abusive father that has messed him up a little in the head," Jake says. "[He] is trying to fit in and find a happy life. I end up living with my stepfather Joey Jeremiah.

"My character changes as the shows go on," he says. "As he tries to fit in, he gets himself into a bit of trouble."

The teen actor made his professional debut in 1998 in Soulpepper's production of Our Town at the Royal Alex Theatre and starred as the Artful Dodger in Cameron MacIntosh's production of Oliver at the Princess of Wales Theatre the next year.



Jake Epstein

On the small screen, Jake played Chris in Real Kids Real Adventures in 1999 and Cam in The Zack Files on YTV in 2000 (the show was on air for two seasons). Two years ago, he acted in the Disney movies Mom's Got a Date with a Vampire and Quints, which earned him a Young Artist Award nomination.

This past summer, Jake took a break from acting and went to Camp Gesher, where he played soccer and performed in a student play called Lip to Lip. The play won an award for best play in the Toronto District at the Sears Theatre Festival. Jake played the son of a lesbian.

Jake, who took the break from acting to concentrate on his studies – much to the delight of his mother – says the opportunity to play Craig on Degrassi changed his mind.

"I was thinking of not acting anymore, but Degrassi changed all that. When the audition came up, I was excited. Acting really becomes your life and if it is going to become your life, you have to really want to be happy with it," Jake says.

Initially, Jake found joining the already close-knit ensemble cast of the weekly ½ hour series intimidating.

"At the beginning, it was threatening," he says. "There were all these kids that had been there for a year and they are all best of friends. Everyone is hugging and kissing each other and it felt awkward."

But Jake soon felt comfortable on set with his peers.

"The kids are really nice; I now feel loved," he jokes. "It is all good fun on the set, especially working with Pat Mastroianni. He's one of the coolest people I know – although I wouldn't say that in front of him. He really helped me to feel part of the cast."

Jake says, "Craig is a good character to play. He's an artistic person, which I can relate to. He's a photographer – in real life I don't take pictures, but I'm learning."

The first episode of the second season of Degrassi: The Next Generation airs on CTV, Sept. 29 at 7 p.m. EDT.

Shakespeare tragedy given Israeli touch

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Antony Nesling says he changed the setting of William Shakespeare's classic tragedy King Lear to the Yom Kippur War of 1973 because current events in Israel are "today's biggest tragedy."

Nesling's play Lear, King of Israel, which he wrote, directed and produced on a meagre budget, was presented late last month at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre for three performances.

The cast of 14 were all amateur actors, some of whom had never appeared onstage before. Nesling, a non-Jewish third year York University theatre student, plays the role of King Lear.

The production's strong opening carries the audience into the tragedy. On a sparsely decorated stage of chairs depicting a British café in Tel Aviv on the eve of the Yom Kippur War, a radio plays John Lennon's Give Peace a Chance. A newscaster interrupts the program to announce a joint attack on Israel by Egypt and Syria. The announcement is quickly followed by a loud blast, and the sabras fall to their deaths as the café is destroyed.

The bodies of the dead are summoned by the Fool, who sets the scene for the enactment of the tragedy of King Lear – the many betrayals and the destruction of all that gave meaning to the protagonist's life.

The Fool, played brilliantly by Anna Cantalini, weaves the plot of the play within the play. As the advisor to the king and the narrator, her fluid movements, body language and wisdom and wit contrast with Nesling's powerful portrayal of King Lear's devastation and madness.

Linking Elizabethan society to the events in the Middle East takes great imagination – the Dukes of Albany and Cornwall are now the Dukes of Zion and Gaza, the king of France is the king of Egypt, the Earl of Gloucester is the Earl of the Negev and his sons are Ariel and Arron and Cordelia's long-suffering mother is Hebron – and although the complexity of the revised plot requires explanation early in the performance, Nesling's debut production is bold and shows much promise. The actors, despite their inexperience, are convincing.

Produced by the Toronto Art Theatre, a co-operative of students in their final years of the theatre program at York University. Proceeds from the Leah Posluns performances were donated to Canadian Magen David Adom.

A buggy ride is the best way to tour Amish country

A buggy ride takes visitors to various sites in the community through four different routes throughout Lancaster, Pa. [Kathryn Kates photo]

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

LANCASTER, Pa. — It might be surprising to learn that the fourth oldest Jewish community in North America, which dates back to 1740, is in the heart of Pennsylvania Dutch Country in Lancaster County in Southeastern Pennsylvania – home to the oldest population of Old Order Amish on the continent.

The rich historical legacy of Lancaster's Reform Congregation Shaarai Shomayim dates back to the beginnings of the colonial town. A Jewish shopkeeper settled in Lancaster in 1740 and held services in his home, acquired two Torahs and established a cemetery, which is now owned by the congregation. Today it is the fourth oldest Jewish burial ground in the United States.

The Amish community, which was depicted in the film Witness starring Harrison Ford, is a Protestant religious group that was founded by Swiss Mennonite bishop Jacob Ammann, who broke away from the Mennonites in 1693 because he felt they weren't strict enough. In the early 1700s, the Amish began leaving Europe to seek religious freedom. Granted land in Pennsylvania by English Quaker William Penn, the community grew. Today, Lancaster County has 22,000 Amish people.

These early settlers, known as Pennsylvania Dutch, are not Dutch at all but Pennsylvania Deutsche (German). The Amish, a rural people whose skill in farming is well-known, speak High German. They are also known, along with the Mennonites, as "the plain people."

One of the best ways to view how they live is to hire a Mennonite guide from the Mennonite Information Center. The guide can accompany you in your vehicle for an insider's view of the Amish farms that are maintained without the use of electricity.

Another way to experience the Amish community first-hand is through Aaron and Jessica's Buggy Rides (http://www.amishbuggyrides.com/html/welcome.html). The company, operated by a family that settled in the region in 1757, takes visitors to various sites in the community through four different routes. One of the drivers, Ted Gilmer, is a Beachy Amish, a more liberal Amish sect that has adopted Mennonite ways.

Sights to see in Lancaster include the Heritage Center Museum, the Fulton Opera House – the oldest continuously operating theatre in the United States and the Central Market, the country's oldest continuously operating farmer's market.

Families will enjoy the theme park Dutch Wonderland and the interactive Discover Lancaster County Museum next door.

There is also good shopping in Lancaster County, especially if you're looking for crafts, antiques and furniture such as handmade, roll-top desks. In the Amish town of Intercourse (named for the number of interstate highways that connect there), you can shop at the 32 boutiques, galleries and gift shops of Kitchen Kettle Village.

The town of Strasburg is a train lover's paradise. Attractions include the Railroad Museum of Pennsylvania, which showcases restored trains, the Choo Choo Barn-Traintown, U.S.A. – a miniature train village – and the Strasburg Rail Road, America's oldest short-line railroad where you can board a Victorian train for a leisurely ride.

On Sept. 27, 1777, during the American Revolution, the members of the Continental Congress, all with prices on their heads, fled the British forces who had captured Philadelphia. Their first session was held at Lancaster's Old Courthouse, which made Lancaster the capital for one day. The congressmen couldn't find lodging, so they were forced to leave town the next day for neighbouring York County.

If Lancaster is the plain people's county, then Reading and Berks County is where the fancy Pennsylvania Dutch, or Pennsylvania German as they prefer to be called, live. The city of Reading – which is pronounced Redding, a shock for those who have always mispronounced it while playing Monopoly – is the birthplace of outlet shopping malls. The VF Factory Outlet boasts 90 designer- and brand-named stores which are housed in old warehouses.

Unlike many newer neighbourhood outlet malls strewn across North America, the discounts here are very substantial. This "outlet city" has become so popular as a women's getaway that "It's A Girl Thing" packages have been created that include pampering at spas such as the state-of-the-art Bell Tower Salon & Spa.

Also in the city is the Centre Park Historic District, a residential area with a park for picnics. The Reading Public Museum and Art Gallery offers a wide variety of fine arts and natural science exhibits. The Reading Phillies Stadium is a double-A baseball park with a twist – it has a swimming pool in the stands.

Along the lush Appalachian Trail you'll find Hex Barn Art. This German and Swiss folk art adorns a number of barns in the county. Hawk Mountain Sanctuary (www.hawkmountain.org) in Kempton is the world's first refuge for birds of prey.

Birdwatchers can take a relaxing walk on the mountaintop or opt to hike along a rocky trail.

If you "think green," then check out Berks County's Rodale Institute Experimental Farm, which grows organic goods. If you are interested in the grape, tours are available at Manatawny Creek Winery.

If you're looking for a place to stay, two romantic inns of note in Reading and Berks County are the historic Oley Valley Inn and the Inn at Glasbern.

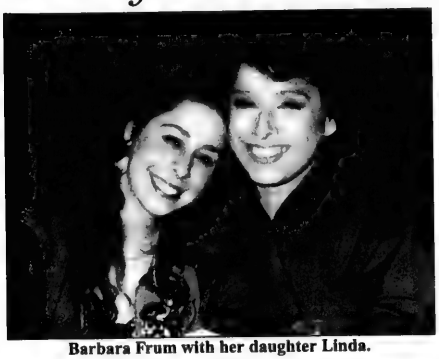
Barbara Frum examined on Life & Times documentary



Barbara Frum with her daughter Linda.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Barbara Frum, the late broadcaster, was recently the subject of Life & Times, CBC TV's documentary series about distinguished Canadians.

Fifty four years old when she died of leukemia in 1992, Frum was a self-made woman who battled cancer with grace and courage.

She was born and raised in Niagara Falls, Ontario, the daughter of a prosperous merchant whose department store was a landmark in the region.

Barbara Rosberg valued knowledge and brought a skeptical sensibility to her surroundings.

She met her husband, Murray Frum – a budding dentist and subsequent property developer – at the University of Toronto. When she graduated, she settled down, in 1950s bourgeois style, as a housewife and mother.

Being restless and inquisitive, she turned to freelance journalism, writing stories on social issues for the Toronto Star.

This led Frum to the CBC and As It Happens, the current affairs radio program that would become immensely popular. Later, she hosted The Journal, CBC TV's flagship show.

Mark Starowicz, the producer of both shows and the man who originally hired her, recalls Frum's stellar contributions, as does Mary Lou Finlay, her co-host on The Journal.

But the liveliest and most poignant recollections come from her husband, her children – Linda and David – and June Callwood, her best friend and comforter.

A stubborn and persistent interviewer who could grate on the nerves, she was diagnosed with chronic leukemia in 1974, and given five years to live.

Despite the death sentence, Frum often worked 12 to 14 hour days, seemingly disregarding the disease gnawing away at her.

She found solace in her beautiful garden, a place of serene beauty that she viewed as her sanctuary.

In her last interview, with Mordecai Richler, Frum appeared to be ill and was not in top form. Afterward, Murray rushed her to hospital, and one month later, she was dead.

Directed by Alan Mendelsohn, Life & Times of Barbara Frum is an affecting portrait of a brave and intelligent woman whose untimely passing was a blow to Canadian journalism.

Donating bone marrow 'like a new beginning'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Evie Cowitz-Cohen had an opportunity few of us do – to try to save a life.

Last month, the 33-year-old rehabilitation counsellor became a bone marrow donor.

Bone marrow transplants are used for people with certain kinds of cancer, and also sometimes for those with immune deficiencies. Under anesthetic, a needle is inserted into the donor's hip, and about a litre of bone marrow is removed. It is then transferred to the ill patient.

As in all transfusions, the donor and the recipient must be genetically compatible. The best chance for a match is someone from the recipient's family. If this is not possible, then the best chance is someone from the same ethnic background.

Acknowledging that a bone marrow transplant is not necessarily a cure, Cowitz-Cohen said, "Even if I am not giving life, I can at least give hope."

She is not looking for either glory or praise by coming forward with her experience. Rather, she wants to encourage people to have a blood screening, and join the Unrelated Bone Marrow Donor Registry.

Her saga began when, moved by the story of Jay Feinberg, a young American man suffering from chronic myelogenic leukemia, she went to one of several mass screenings.

While she was not a match for Feinberg, who has since received his transplant and is doing well, she remained on the registry.

Earlier this summer, she received a call from the registry, saying she was at least a partial match for someone, and asking her to come for more extensive blood testing. Shortly afterward, she was told that she was a perfect match.

Cowitz-Cohen was "stunned. I felt good. Wow!"

She did not feel so enthusiastic just because she could help someone. Newly single, she saw the experience as "like a new lease on life for me – a new beginning."

Once the initial euphoria wore off, she said, concerns crept in. "They told me that I would feel some pain, and a lot of fatigue."

This didn't particularly bother her, except that she has to keep up with her five-year-old son, Tyler. Fortunately, she said, "I have a wonderful support network of family and friends."

As it happened, the support was badly needed, since the recipient needed more than the usual litre of marrow, which prolonged the surgery and left her more exhausted and uncomfortable than she had expected.

However, she has no regrets. Although she was aware that the registry does not allow contact between the donor and the recipient, especially at first, she said that she slipped a note for him into the operating room, "sending love and positive energy." The doctor assured her that he had sent the note along with the marrow.

Most important, to her, was being told that the recipient had no adverse reaction to the transplant.

To find out about joining the Unrelated Bone Marrow Donor Registry, call 613-560-7440 and ask for the UBMDR; in Toronto, call 416-974-9900.

Many Righteous Gentiles forgotten, Oxford prof says

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to The CJN

There are thousands of righteous individuals who saved Jews during the Holocaust who will never be recognized as righteous because there is no one around to tell their stories, says renowned British historian Martin Gilbert.

"A recorded righteous honour can only go to those who have saved Jews and have had the Jewish survivors share their stories, Gilbert said at the 12th annual Ronald Heller Memorial Lecture, held recently at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The first recorded history of a righteous act came during Egyptian times when two midwives refused to follow Pharaoh's instructions and have all first-born Israelite children killed, said Gilbert, who is a fellow at Oxford University's Merton College.

By not following orders, the midwives saved many Jewish lives, he said.

The next righteous person was Pharaoh's daughter who found a Jewish baby, Moses, floating in a basket on the Nile river, and saved him.

Gilbert said that from Hitler's rise in Germany in 1933 to his demise and the end of the war in 1945, judges, researchers, and experts at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Centre in Jerusalem have recorded 20,000 non-Jews as righteous, and continue to add more than 500 on an annual basis.

Currently, rules have been relaxed to include more than 50 diplomats located in Europe who issued visas and exit permits for Jews against orders from their respective governments.

"There are several stories like this, including the British general in Berlin who sent 5,000 Jews to British Palestine, and a Chinese diplomat, Dr. Ho, who issued visas for those in concentration camps to go to Shanghai," Gilbert said.

However, when Europe was sealed by the Germans and the diplomats expelled, the rescue efforts fell squarely upon the shoulders of non-Jewish residents, he said.

In Poland, where three million Jews lived before the war, an environment of tremendous anti-Semitism and persecution did not prevent 5,632 righteous individuals from saving the lives of thousands of Jews, Gilbert said.

As a result, he said, Poland has the highest number of these individuals and the greatest percentage per capita than any other country except the Netherlands.

In one instance, a small Baptist sect in Poland believed that the greatest challenge and honour was to save a Jewish life, and many of its followers competed to take Jews into their homes.

Once they had a Jewish person in their home, they would pray, thanking God for the blessing of enabling them to save a son of Israel.

Gilbert said there are many other righteous individuals across Europe, even in Muslim communities such as Bosnia and Albania, who have taken extraordinary measures to save the lives of Jews.

These people must be properly honoured and respected, he said.

Gilbert's book, titled The Righteous, is expected to be released next spring.

Veteran referee has seen all the great ones

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In his 60-year career in boxing, Harry Davis has seen just about everything there is to see. A competitive amateur fighter in his youth, he went on to a distinguished career as a referee in more than 4,000 fights and later as a judge in another 2,000 bouts, including more than 60 world championship fights.

He's seen most of the great ones fight – George Forman, Lennox Lewis, George Chuvalo – but the best match he's ever witnessed involved two lesser-known fighters duking it out in a boxing club on Toronto's Vaughan Road.

It was back in the 1970s when Aldo Carelli and Ronnie Edwards squared off in a classic, toe to toe, 10-round duel before only a couple of hundred dedicated fans.

"From the opening bell they started to go like windmills," Davis recalled. "Arms were flying. They kept up the same pace all the way through. I don't know where they got the energy."

Davis, who at the time was already a veteran referee, didn't have to lay a hand on the fighters, and so could stand back and enjoy the fight as much as the spectators. What made the bout even more of a classic, Davis continued, was that Carelli was ahead on points going into the last round when Edwards finally knocked him out and won the contest.

Ah the memories. When you've been in boxing as long as Davis, you have enough memories to fill a book. At 75, Davis is still creating memories both in the ring and outside. He recently travelled to Wales to judge a WBO world title fight and he recently acted in a fight film, Against the Ropes, starring Meg Ryan, that will be released in 2003. It's about Jackie Kallen, a Jewish woman who manages a world champion, Davis explained.

Davis, who also appeared in The Hurricane as a referee in a fight scene, does the same in Against the Ropes.

When he began his fight career as a teenager in Depression-era Toronto, Davis could hardly have expected it would allow him to rub shoulders with Ryan or Denzel Washington, who played the lead role in The Hurricane.

Referee Harry Davis counts out Shawn O'Sullivan in his 1988 match against Donovan Boucher.

Life was tough in Toronto back then, and "being Jewish didn't help" when it came to acceptance by neighbours.

"The buck was a lot harder to get. I went to work for $8 a week in a shoe factory. I wanted a bicycle and my dad said, 'Go to work.' I was about 12."

Back then, Joe Louis was a hero to lots of kids and Davis was thrilled when the black American fighter defeated the Nazis' great white hope, Max Schmelling.

In the early 1940s, Davis started boxing as a lightweight (135 lb.) at the Brunswick YMHA under the supervision of trainers Aaron Clairman and Al Grace. He compiled a 20-5 amateur record, boxing fighters from around Ontario.

When Clairman and Grace entered the Canadian armed forces, his training was taken over by David Yak at the Toronto Athletic Club at Queen and Bay, across from what is now Old City hall.

"We used to fight for $5, $6, or $8. One time I won a voucher for a straw hat," he said.

Fights were either three three-minute rounds or five two-minute rounds and boxers wore no head protection.

By the mid 1940s, David realized he had gone as far as he could go as a fighter, and facing the disapproving glare of his parents, who weren't happy at his vocation, he gave it up to become a trainer.

"I trained 'em to box, not to just go in and start punching. Boxers last longer than brawlers," he said.

In 1952, Davis passed some exams, plunked down $1 and received his referee's license from the Ontario Athletic Commission (OAC), the sport's governing body. His first fights were bouts at the East York Arena, the Palace Pier (near Strachan) and in surrounding communities like London.

In all the fights he handled, "it gives me pride to know there were no serious injuries," he said.

"As a ref, you have to keep your eyes open. If you see a fighter in trouble, you stop it. It's better to stop it one punch before than one punch after."

David believes the number of boxing fatalities has decreased since the 1950s when fights were allowed to go on longer. And when people ask him about the boxing deaths, "I tell [them], more people are killed in speedways and more jockeys are killed at the track."

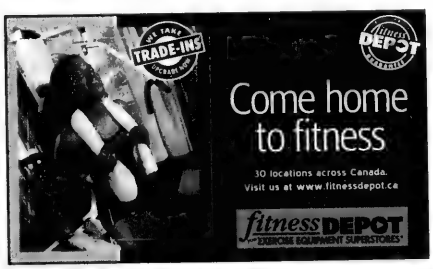
As his career progressed, Davis' talents were recognized by others. In 1973 he filled in for about a year as acting OAC commissioner.

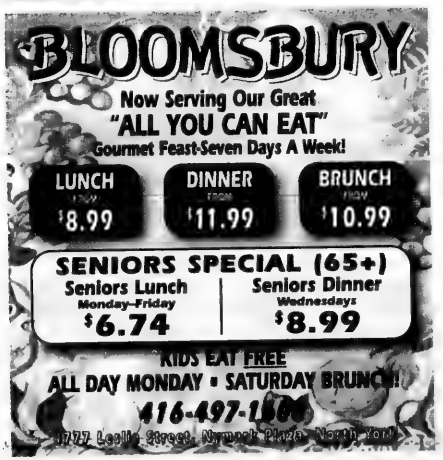
In 1976 he was inducted into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame and in 1984 he was given the privilege of reffing a world welterweight bout between Nicky Furlano and world champ Aaron Pryor. That was the first world title fight in Toronto in quite a while, he said.

In his day in the squared circle, Davis has experienced a few "oddities." He's been on the receiving end of a punch that went astray and he's had his chain yanked by a comedic fighter. When he asked the boxer prior to the match if he had his cup, "he answered, 'cup? I don't need a cup. I drink straight out of the bottle.'"

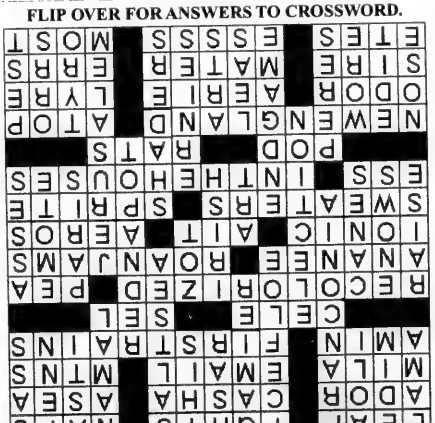
Although Davis is in the last few rounds of his colourful career, he has no interest in retiring.

"I'm going to do this until they count me out," he said.





FLIP OVER FOR ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD.



Where does God fit in my quest for a meaningful life?

By JODI KOVITZ

Some of you have e-mailed me moving stories of your experiences with God. One reader wrote that he was one of four friends to survive a car accident. He asked me how he could not believe that God had wanted him to live for some reason. After the accident, he wrote, he became more observant and spiritually fulfilled. Another reader shared how he connected to God just after his father passed away. Engaging in the ritual of prayer gave him hope and a new Jewish identity.

I had not considered my relationship with God until recently, nor what that relationship (or lack thereof) meant for me as a Jew. As a participant in Reviving Eden's Soul Retreat, I was asked to express, in 30 seconds to a stranger, when I had last "experienced" God. Two vastly different moments came to mind, sharing one common element – my being connected to an entity larger than myself.

My first experience occured the day of my grandfather's funeral 10 years ago. I felt comforted by a unique presence, who reassured me that there was a reason why my "pop-pop" died, and that he would be taken care of.

The second experience took place several years ago when I sat atop a small mountain in Capri, Italy. The view was magical – my concept of Eden. I was deeply moved and felt so lucky to experience that moment. It was the one time in my life I thanked God.

Although I acknowledge that God exists, as I have "experienced" Him, I do not worship or pray (particularly not in synagogue environment). I sometimes read the words in the prayer book just to participate, but they don't mean anything to me.

On one hand, I am comfortable with this. I cannot change my feelings. However, over the years I have learned that believing with certainty that our God exists, and acknowledging this conviction as a community on an ongoing basis, is a practice that is central to being Jewish.

So, here I am, a 20-something, "culturally Jewish" woman, who does not pray to God or worship Him in the conventional sense. Yet I experience spiritual renewal in other ways – through playing or listening to music, practicing yoga, learning about Judaism, reading and simply being outside. Am I still a "real Jew," even if I do not maintain a practice that so many others seem comfortable with? Can I have my "own" sense of God and still feel like I belong to the Jewish community?

I don't think anyone would reject me for wrestling with the concept of God. However, being part of a community that shares so many values and seem to conform in so many ways, I judge myself. I constantly wonder – why don't I really feel God? Why don't I experience God on a more regular basis? Why does my grandmother feel renewed and get a sense of hope through prayer to God while I would rather read a self-help book?

Yes, I'm struggling with this issue. But I have learned that the struggle isn't as bad if I just let it be what it is – one facet of my quest for a meaningful life.

I continue to welcome your insight. I can be reached at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

People look to Jewish education to combat assimilation and intermarriage, but I find that prescription demeaning to the spirit of Jewish learning (reductionist of an entity far more complex and compelling), and misinterpretive of assimilation as a force in Jewish society.

By assimilation, I refer to the interaction between Jews and their host culture – a two-way street. Why do Orthodox Jews wear ties? Why do New Yorkers of all religions use Yiddish phrases in their speech, as the Viennese once did? Why do most Ashkenazi synagogues of all denominations seat their congregants in the same fashion as churches? Why did Verdi introduce a Sephardi melody in La Traviata? Etc.

We have assimilated everywhere we ever settled. Cultures do that. Ironically, Israel is now one of the best examples of cultural assimilation. Israelis eat Middle-Eastern Arabic food and call it Israeli, used to sing Zionist words to Russian folk melodies, now sing Hebrew words to Greek tunes, and wear designer clothes of the west. To assimilate is either natural or inevitable. But when does assimilation become a danger? When it is mixed with indifference and ignorance.

When Jews forget their own treasure house of history, literature and spiritual values and become indifferent to the pulse of Jewish creative life, the majority culture and its values become dominant, easily overpowering the Jewish spirit. A case in point was an advertisement I recently saw in the Ashkenaz program booklet. Since it had nothing to do with Ashkenaz, this is not a criticism of that wondrous community happening. One of the new klezmer groups in Toronto played for a wedding "of a nice Jewish boy… to a sweet Jamaican woman." The music was a fusion of klezmer melodies with reggae beats – cultural assimilation that we know and love. Indeed, that is the very essence of klezmer.

The danger point for the Jewish spirit is when multiculturalism becomes a supreme value that blurs the real differences between the nice Jewish boy and the sweet Jamaican woman. A priori, their marriage is not healthy for either Jamaican or Jewish culture. In any given couple, it might be a romantic union between two lovers, but in the larger picture, it is the heat under the melting pot rather than the caring and careful preservation of a mosaic.

The klezmer music is assimilation at its best; intermarriage is indifference at its saddest.

Israel is Our Mission...Why Wait?

With the advent of a New Year, many of us are asking how we can personally assist Israel. One of the most powerful ways is just by being there. Your presence will help to fuel Israel's struggling economy, revive the tourism industry and improve the morale of every Israeli you meet. With so many missions and individual travel options available, there's no time to wait and there's no better time to go. If you want to make a significant difference for Israel, make a commitment to visit our indescribably beautiful land as soon as possible.

After all, Israel is yours. So please say I care and I'm going.

THE SYNAGOGUE CHALLENGE

Several synagogues have organized missions for their members. Just by taking this crucial step, they are, in effect, challenging every synagogue across the country to do the same. If your synagogue is planning a group trip, please let us at the Israel Government Tourist Office know, so that we can let others know and provide some helpful advice as well.

Tuesday Morning: Oct. 29, Nov. 5, 12, 19, 26 at 10:30-11:30AM with Chana Weisberg, dean, author, columnist

This course starts off with a fascinating historical overview of society's regard for women throughout historical times, in other religions as well as in modern feminist thought, and leads to how this view contrasts with Judaism. The course culminates with an in-depth examination of one special woman: Chana, mother of Samuel, and examines as well the potency and philosophy behind a woman's prayer.

Этот курс начинается с интереснейшего обзора об отношении к женщине в разные исторические периоды, в разных религиях, в современном феминизме, а также о том, как это соотносится со взглядами иудаизма на эту тему. Кульминационной точкой этого курса является образ Ханны, матери Самуила. На её примере расматривается сила и философия женской молитвы.

Federal Court of Appeal rejects 'Green Line' policy on charities

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The Federal Court of Appeal has rejected Canada's decade-old policy of disallowing tax-deductible donations to charitable groups that operate outside Israel's pre-1967 borders because the policy is not enshrined in law.

But the court upheld the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency's (CCRA) intention to revoke the charitable status of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) on other grounds.

In a Sept. 13 decision, the court rejected arguments that CMDA should be de-registered as a charity because it provides services in the so-called occupied territories, meaning the West Bank, Gaza, the Golan Heights and eastern Jerusalem.

The court found the CCRA policy is not enshrined in legal statutes or tax regulations, and thus could not be applied in the case of CMDA, which is affiliated with Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's equivalent of the Red Cross.

Partial victory in CMDA tax case

Yet, the court ruled 2-1 that a notice of intention filed by the CCRA, formerly Revenue Canada, in 2000 to de-register CMDA can proceed, saying it found no evidence that ambulances and other supplies transferred to Magen David Adom (MDA) were being used only for charitable purposes.

The court also found that there was no proper agency agreement between CMDA and MDA, which is a separate organization. In evidence, CMDA acknowledged only a "tacit" agreement with MDA.

The panel also raised the issue of whether, and to what extent, MDA is involved in Israeli military operations, since evidence showed that in Israel, the entire high-frequency FM radio network of the MDA system is available to the Israel Defence Forces in times of crisis.

Sharon meets Putin

Israel called an important partner

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir Putin praised Israel on Monday for its decision to end the siege of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Ramallah compound.

Speaking during a photo opportunity with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in Moscow ahead of a meeting between the two leaders, Putin said he was aware the decision was not a simple one and had been made under domestic and international pressure.

See related story on page 38

The Russian leader said he sees Israel as an important partner in the international war on terror, adding that he supports U.S. President George W. Bush's efforts in this matter.

Putin also condemned acts of terror and said he would discuss various related issues with Sharon, including the Iraqi crisis, in order to find a real solution through diplomatic channels and according to UN resolutions.

Sharon, who arrived in Russia Sunday evening, was to spend Monday in Moscow with Putin for talks on bilateral and international issues.

Parents Rejected

JERUSALEM — Israel's interior minister has refused to register a gay couple as the parents of a boy they adopted in the United States. Yishai, a member of the Shas party, also said the boy would be raised in an incorrect, unhealthy and negative way.

WORLD

Deportation Requested

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Department of Justice has asked a federal immigration court in Philadelphia to deport a former SS Death's Head Guard who served at three Nazi concentration camps. The request follows a July 2000 decision by the U.S. District Court to revoke the citizenship of Theodor Szehinskyj, 76, a retired machinist who was posted at the Gross-Rosen, Sachsenhausen and Warsaw camps. The native of Galicia, Poland, guarded prisoners from 1943 to 1945.

Insurance Settlement

BERLIN — Germany has agreed to pay some $100 million (US) to cover unpaid Holocaust-era insurance claims. In a deal reached Sept. 18 with the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims, Germany also agreed to pay roughly $174 million (US) for a humanitarian fund. The settlement, reached after two years of difficult talks, also calls for German insurers to publish lists of policies taken out by Jews before and during the Holocaust.

'Shop for Israel' Day

SAN DIEGO — The California-based non-profit Web site Shopinisrael.com, which lets people buy Israeli goods directly from Israeli merchants, is promoting Dec. 1, the third night of Chanukah, as Support Israel Day. Jews are urged to exchange gifts purchased through the site to support Israeli merchants hurt by the drop in visitors since the start of the latest intifadah.

Israeli Arab Warned of Attack

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab seriously wounded in a suicide bombing in northern Israel had alerted police before the attack, officials said.

Israeli police initially suspected that Rami Mahamid, 17, helped the bomber carry out the Sept. 18 attack near the Israeli Arab city of Umm el-Fahm.

However, it later emerged that Mahamid was the person who first reported the presence of a suspicious person to police.

Mahamid struck up a conversation with the terrorist and asked to borrow his cellphone on the pretext of calling a friend, reports said. Instead, he called police and asked them to send a patrol. When the police van arrived, the bomber blew himself up, killing an officer and wounding three other people, including Mahamid.

Police said Mahamid acted courageously.

Feds say they won't change policy on Nazis

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A spokesperson for federal Citizenship and Immigration Minister Denis Coderre is denying media reports the ministry may allow Nazi war crime suspects to remain in Canada once their citizenship has been removed.

Mark Dunn, director of communications for Coderre, told The CJN, "revocation and deportation won't change ... The policy is not changing."

Dunn was responding to a report that Coderre had asked for a review of the policy of deporting elderly Nazi war criminals. One option being considered was that suspects would lose their citizenship but not be removed from Canada, a report in the National Post indicated.

Citing unnamed "senior officials in the Immigration Department," the Post reported that the ministry was considering ways that Canada could demonstrate it did not condone a war criminal's actions while avoiding the costly deportation process.

Dunn acknowledged the minister had asked for a review of all ministry policies – including those affecting Nazi war criminals – and that one of the policy options being floated involved denaturalizing suspects without deporting them. "But most options won't see the light of day," he said, including the one involving Nazi war criminals.

Dunn repeated a longstanding government policy formulation: "We don't want war criminals in this country at all. Canada will not be a safe haven for any kind of war criminal.

"We will continue to actively go after them."

Since focusing its strategy on denaturalizing and deporting war criminals in 1995, the government has launched 17 cases.

What the debates omit

From the editor's desk

The justification emanating from Washington for confrontation with Iraq shifted somewhat over the past few weeks.

Originally, President George W. Bush spoke about the need for "regime change" in Baghdad. Implicit in the argument, of course, was the underlying reason for the need to change the Iraqi regime, namely, that it poses a major danger and threat to the peace and security of a number of nations in the world.

By speaking about regime change, however, Bush was confusing the issue by interchanging the effect of an impending military campaign with its cause.

Thus, when he stood recently before the UN General Assembly, making the case for a showdown with Saddam Hussein, Bush set straight any confusion by focusing on the cause. He spoke, not about regime change, but about the ever-growing threat to the world arising from the weapons of mass destruction that the Iraqi dictator has acquired over the past decade, his record of having used such weaponry in the past and his undoubted readiness to use them in the future.

In the process, Bush conscripted the UN in the possible campaign against Saddam by reinvigorating with new urgency the call for inspection of the secret Iraqi storehouses of weapons.

Judging by the unequivocal remarks made earlier last week by Foreign Minister Bill Graham regarding Saddam's need to be completely forthcoming with any system of weapons inspections required by the UN, it appears that Canada might be edging closer to the American-British point of view on the subject.

This would be a welcome development, although without a definitive statement by the prime minister, one cannot know for certain where Canada stands on the matter.

In the ubiquitous discussions and debates surrounding Iraq, however, one seldom hears or sees any reference to Saddam's unprovoked, gratuitously vile attack on Israeli civilians during the Gulf War more than a decade ago.

Israel was not part of the war, sent no soldiers to fight in the war; nor did it lend any military hardware to the coalition forces, yet Saddam launched 39 SCUD missiles into the Tel Aviv area with the aim of destroying Israel's Ministry of Defence headquarters and of killing as many Israelis as possible. It is, frankly, a disturbingly telling omission.

The defenders of Saddam Hussein and their anti-American fellow travellers, of course, supported his strikes at Israel. Indeed they cheered the rain of missiles upon the Jewish state.

The opponents of Saddam, at least most of them – the non-Arab members of the coalition – did not support the SCUD strikes. Indeed, a great deal of the American effort was dedicated to eliminating the missile launch sites.

But even so, the assault by Saddam was seen as expected, accepted as inevitable – thus mitigating somewhat its inherently evil nature – a sound tactical move on his part, hoping to evoke an Israeli response that would thereby disrupt the assiduously crafted coalition of forces. (What this says about the world's expectations of Israel and of the nature of the coalition forces whose loyalty to the cause depended upon the Jewish state willingly submitting to the possible deaths of hundreds, if not more, of its own citizens, is another matter.)

When the Israelis publicly announced they would pay the patently unreasonable, unfair price in order to keep the coalition intact, Saddam nevertheless continued his missile launches against the Jewish state.

And again, some people simply saw this as somehow expected, the military confirmation of his oft-expressed support for the Palestinians, again "understanding" and again mitigating somewhat the inherent evil in the SCUD attacks.

In truth, however, Saddam's gleeful attempt to slaughter Israelis was self-serving and cynical. It had much less to do with support for the Palestinians than it did with his long-standing aim of wanting to harm if not destroy the Jewish state. It was another proof of the man's mammoth malevolence.

More than a decade later, the sick scenario has returned. Israel again is under threat from Saddam, although it has not acted aggressively towards Iraq. And once again, the threat is being "accepted" or "understood" as soundly tactical or as merely a manifestation of the linkage of Saddam's cause to that of the Palestinians.

It is our duty, however, to remind the world that there must never be any "acceptance" or "understanding" of Saddam's plotting. Moreover, we must firmly resist any effort at linking the campaign against him with the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

In the Wall Street Journal of Sept. 27, noted Middle Eastern scholar Bernard Lewis, effectively debunked that false linkage. "The conflict with Israel certainly receives overwhelmingly major attention in the Arabic media, but since this is the only specific grievance that may be publicly expressed in a region of numerous and painful problems, that is hardly surprising. One may therefore wonder whether Middle Eastern governments indeed wish for a peace settlement, which would deprive them of this valuable safety valve, leaving them to face the undeflected anger of their subjects, including those who live under the rule of the Palestine Authority. From the almost monotonous regularity with which a series of promising peace processes have failed at the moment when they seemed most likely to succeed, one may be driven to the conclusion that they prefer to keep the conflict unresolved."

No apology given for U of T Anti-Calendar

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at the University of Toronto have stepped up their advocacy efforts on behalf of Israel – but early results have been mixed at best.

Students associated with Hillel, a Jewish student campus group, last week were rebuffed in their efforts to extract an apology from the Arts and Science Students Union (ASSU), publishers of the controversial Anti-Calendar, an annual publication containing student evaluations of more than 1,600 courses and instructors in U of T's faculty of arts and science.

This past summer, Jewish students were alerted that this year's Anti-Calendar was to be dedicated "to the memory of the Innocents, Afghanistan and Palestine, murdered," as well as to Islamabad murder victim Iqbal Masih, Chinese students and workers in Beijing and women engineering students who were murdered in Montreal.

The exclusion of Israeli terror victims angered Jewish students, as did the omission of those killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

After last week's meeting with ASSU president Ranjini Ghosh, which Hillel representatives called productive, the Jewish students were hopeful she would be able to convince the ASSU executive to support an open joint letter with Hillel in which ASSU would apologize for the Anti-Calendar's dedication.

However, Ghosh said she made the suggestion to the four-person executive, but it was turned down. "I don't know why," she said "Possibly they didn't want to be tied up with a campus group."

Under the auspices of Hillel, and with the counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress' Simon Rosenblum, Jewish students had met earlier to discuss an appropriate response, said Adam Cutler, chair of Hillel's student co-ordinating committee.

The students decided to establish a Task Force for a Respectful Anti-Calendar and to approach various U of T colleges and clubs for their support, Cutler said.

The students also launched a petition citing the "unconscionable" omission of "the innocent victims of Sept. 11 and Israel" and calling on the ASSU executive "to publicly apologize for this disrespectful and offensive dedication."

Cutler said he was disappointed at the failure of the ASSU executive to apologize for the Anti-Calendar's dedication.

"Obviously we're still looking for something. We're going to press forward until we get a public apology," he said.

The various colleges and clubs on campus were receptive to Hillel's critiques of the Anti-Calendar and he said their governing bodies were scheduled to begin meetings last week to discuss their response. In addition, efforts will be stepped up to gather 1,000 signatures on the petition.

Ghosh said she assured Cutler "there was no malicious intent" when the Anti-Calendar's dedication was vetted by ASSU.

She said the dedication was conceived prior to the summer and "we got caught up in events of the time.

"When I read it before, I didn't think it was exclusive. After talking to Adam, I can see why they'd get angry."

Ghosh said that at no time did she feel the dedication was disrespectful to any group, but she conceded that given subsequent events during the summer – particularly the terror attack on the Hebrew University cafeteria – "it made us look really bad.

"In my opinion, if so much of the stuff that happened in the summer didn't [happen], it wouldn't have been so bad."

Hillel's response to the Anti-Calendar is part of a "more pro-active approach" to campus issues affecting Jewish students, Cutler said. For the last two years, Jewish students have resolved to fight back when they see Israel under attack.

Hillel's response part of 'more pro-active approach'

An Israel Advocacy Group has been established and two weeks ago, 25 students met to discuss ways to boost Israel's image on campus. In addition, an Israel Awareness Group, which aims at giving Jewish students more information about the Middle East situation, has also been busy at work, Cutler said.

UJA Federation has boosted funding towards Israel-related programming and Congress' Rosenblum has lent his expertise to helping Jewish students counter pro-Arab propaganda.

"My advice is to really get out there and make a campaign of it," Rosenblum said, referring to the Anti-Calendar controversy. "This is an eyesore and most students would see it that way."

Meanwhile, the University of Toronto Objectivist Club is sponsoring an event on Oct. 6 titled, the Moral Case for Supporting Israel. The club's members are interested in philosophy and are considered strong supporters of Israel.

Wiesel still an optimist at 74

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ SHERMAN
Special to the CJN

Terrorism may be evolving, but its evil roots remain unchanged, Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel told a Toronto audience recently.

"Sept. 11 was just a phase in the process," warned Wiesel, who has studied the history of terrorism for decades. "But, actually, suicide killing began long ago."

What has changed, he said, is the motivation behind acts of terror.

"In the past, terrorists left behind a message, or a demand of some sort," Wiesel said. "For the first time in history, terrorists are killing without leaving a message. They want death to become the message."

Wiesel was the keynote speaker at a tribute dinner honouring Dr. Zane Cohen, a colorectal surgeon currently serving his third term as surgeon-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"I never miss an opportunity to honour a physician," joked Wiesel at the start of his speech. "I never know when I might need one."

Wiesel, 74, is an internationally renowned human rights activist who has has taught at Boston University since 1976 and has received numerous awards, including the U.S. Presidential Medal of Freedom and the Nobel Peace Prize.

His first book, Night, which has sold millions of copies and been translated from the original French into 25 languages, spawned an entire generation of Holocaust memoirs after its publication in 1958 and started Wiesel's professional journey from journalist to author and activist.

The book is an autobiographical portrayal of Wiesel's experiences as a 15-year-old boy sent to Auschwitz and then Buchenwald before being liberated by the Allies in 1945. Both of Wiesel's parents and a younger sister were murdered in the death camps.

In his talk, he discussed past and present manifestations of anti-Semitism.

"Why does anti-Semitism exist?" Wiesel asked the audience. "The reasons that they have are as old as history."

He acknowledged the "anxiety" and "uncertainty" many Jews feel right now with the worldwide rise in violent anti-Semitic incidents, suicide bombings in Israel and the threat of international terrorism.

"Of course we are worried, for ourselves and for Israel," he said. "We don't know what will happen."

But, if and when America strikes Iraq as part of its campaign against terrorism, "there is absolutely no doubt that [Iraqi leader] Saddam Hussein will strike Israel again," Wiesel said, adding that he fully supports the U.S.-led war on terror.

Commenting on the deteriorating relationship between Israel and the Palestinians, Wiesel said he staunchly supports Israel's right to defend itself against terror. He decried Palestinian terrorists' use of random targets by vehemently insisting that "an Israeli general would never purposely kill a child."

Wiesel also reflected on his close friendship with the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, recalling the pivotal day in September 1993, when Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat shook hands on the White House lawn, with former U.S. president Bill Clinton looking on proudly.

Wiesel, who sat in the audience that day, recalls being stunned at his own reaction. He remembers feeling that peace was "so close you could taste it."

Getting back to the current climate, he said that no matter what is going on in the world, the international Jewish community must stick together.

"Today, a unity has been achieved," Wiesel said. "The people of Israel are one people. We know it, we feel it."

Wiesel urged the crowd not to miss what he said is a fleeting opportunity. "Life is not made up of years, but moments. We need to seize this moment, define our Jewishness and ask ourselves, 'What is my obligation as a Jew today?'"

Wiesel said he remains hopeful about the long-term prospects for peace.

"Should we be smiling pessimists or weeping optimists? Let's not weep, let's smile."

More than 800 guests turned out for the event, sponsored by the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University and Mount Sinai Hospital.

Proceeds will go toward the Zane and Joan Cohen Endowment Scholarship Fund, which supports research into gastrointestinal diseases at BGU and a new surgical same-day admitting unit at Mount Sinai.

Israel and Diaspora conference at U of T

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A two-day conference on Israel and the Diaspora gets under way this week at the University of Toronto.

The symposium is called Israel, the Diaspora and the Jewish Past: Continuity or Rupture?

It takes place at the Munk Centre for International Studies, 1 Devonshire Place, and is sponsored by the Halbert Exchange Committee.

Featuring Canadian and Israeli scholars, the conference is scheduled to begin on Monday, Oct. 7 at 9 a.m. with introductory remarks by Derek Penslar of U of T and Israel Bartal of Hebrew University.

The first talk, set to begin at 9:30 a.m., is by Aviezer Ravitzky. The Hebrew University professor's topic is The Jewish People Today: Between Determinism and Freedom.

Ravitzky will be followed by David Novak of U of T. The subject of his speech is The Jewish Textual Base for a Secular Polity.

From 11:15 to 12:45 p.m., Michael Silber and Bartal will respectively discuss The Unorthodox Vision of a 19th Century Zealot, and Secular Zionism and the Reinvention of Orthodox Messianism.

From 2:30 p.m. onward, Dan Avnon and Jonathan Frankel, both of Hebrew University, will speak on The Hebrew Notion of Citizenship: Biblical and Modern and Jewish Power, Then and Now.

Menchem Brinker of Hebrew U kicks off the second day at 9 a.m. with a talk on The Jewish Literary Heritage and Modern Hebrew Literature.

The conference ends with a speech by U of T's Michael Bodemann on post-war German Jewry and its relationship with Israel.

Addressing Judaism in a turbulent world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An all-day conference at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation on Oct. 13 will deal with Judaism in a turbulent world.

Sponsored by Torah in Motion, the title of the event is Renewing Our Spirit: Self, Family, Nation.

Some of the topics to be covered are spirituality, the Jewish family, ethics in the modern world, women's health and Israel.

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb, executive vice-president of the Orthodox Union, will deliver the keynote address, How Can Judaism Thrive in Modernity? The evening will have a town hall format to facilitate a dialogue between Rabbi Weinreb, the audience and conference organizers, rabbis Jay Kelman and Michael Skobac, and teacher Elliott Malamet.

David Berger, professor of history at Brooklyn College and the Graduate Center of City University of New York, will discuss Jewish messianic movements throughout the centuries.

Rabbi Mordechai Becher, the popular former senior lecturer at Ohr Somayach and now senior lecturer at Monsey, N.Y.'s Gateways Organization, an educational outreach program, will discuss parenting and how Judaism can enhance spirituality.

The relationship between science and Halachah will be discussed by Rabbi Michael Broyde, academic director of the law and religion program at Emory University. He will also speak on homosexuality. There will be special programs for children at a nominal charge.

Cost of admission is $36 for the whole day and evening, including lunch for pre-registrants; $18 for full-time students and $10 for only the evening program.

Torah in Motion is dedicated to presenting programs which address the relationship between Torah and society, focusing on, a media release says, the interface of modern society and Jewish law and thought.

Removing a policy of discrimination

The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) seems determined to de-register Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom (CMDA) as a charitable institution under the Income Tax Act capable of issuing tax receipts to Canadians who make contributions to the organization.

Two weeks ago, the Federal Court of Appeal granted the CCRA permission to continue with the de-registration process. But in doing so, the court effectively struck down a policy of the CCRA that we (see The CJN editorial, July 11) and others considered unconscionable. The CCRA had adopted the policy that CMDA violated the Income Tax Act when, in the course of rescue and life-saving services in Israel, CMDA-donated ambulances were being used outside of Israel's pre-June 4, 1967 borders. Such use of the ambulances was deemed by the CCRA to be an "activity which lent support to Israeli settlements" beyond the June '67 borders, thus undermining Canadian public policy regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In our view, the CCRA stance was bad policy.

As we wrote in our editorial, it was "illogical, inconsistent, discriminatory, offensive, hypocritical and just plain wrong." We are indeed pleased therefore, that the CCRA policy was rejected by the Federal Court of Appeal.

The court noted that it was wrong for the CCRA, in effect, to apply policy that it had authored without any legislative or regulatory underpinning. Writing for the court, Justice Karen Sharlow found that "certainly no such policy has found expression in any act of Parliament, in any regulation, or in any publicly available government document of any kind."

As Arthur Drache, counsel for CMDA, told CJN reporter Ron Csillag, "It's a wildly important decision for Jewish organizations. It opens the door to a lot of charities which would [otherwise] be at risk. If they're run properly, [the ruling implies] they can operate any place."

Drache also noted that the application by the CCRA of its discredited policy may have caused substantial harm to members and organizations in the community. Writing in the National Post, Sept. 16, he speculated: "What is not clear as yet is what, if anything, the CCRA will do to make amends to the large number of Jewish organizations which have suffered, even to the extent of winding up, because of the wrong-headed interpretation of the law."

Though there is still a jeopardy to the charitable status of CMDA, the issue will not be decided on the unfair application of a questionable and odious policy that effectively discriminated only against Jewish Canadians. The issue, we hope, will now be decided on its substantive merits, on sound, well-established principles of statutory interpretation and on the specific facts and circumstances of the case.

Claims against Claims Conference

Readers respond to "A survivor's claim against the Claims Conference" by Eli Pfefferkorn (CJN, Sept. 5)

Who do all the funds administered by the Claims Conference belong to? These funds belong to all aging Holocaust survivors in need of health care, home care and, in some instances, simple financial assistance to meet everyday expenses.

Slave labour funds should be distributed expeditiously. Many survivors have waited two years and endured frustration and aggravation. As well, many survivors live on the edge of poverty. Giving assistance to Jews in Argentina and Brazil is important. But these immediate needs should be met from funds of the World Jewish Congress philanthropies. It is inappropriate to divert funds belonging to Shoah survivors.

Let's hope that the newly installed board of the Claims Conference will do justice to their responsibility to survivors in their "golden" years. Holocaust survivors, of whom 48 per cent live in Israel, 36 per cent in the United States, 6.5 per cent in Canada, 6 per cent in Australia and the widely dispersed balance of 4 per cent, deserve the benefits, even so late in their lives.

Michael Rosenberg, President,
Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada

I wish to commend Eli Pfefferkorn for writing such an insightful article.

I am a Holocaust survivor. I applied to the Claims Conference 12 years ago for some compensation for my suffering and for the loss of my whole family. I am the only one left. They keep telling me that I do not fit their criteria.

Pfefferkorn's article expresses my feelings about the Claims Conference.

Something should be done about the way the Claims Conference handles the survivors who are still left.

I congratulate Eli Pfefferkorn on this well-documented article which is long overdue.

For years, many survivors refused to apply for "blood money" from those who murdered our families. However, we are now talking of slave labour payments, insurance claims and bank deposits, monies the banks and insurance companies held in trust for customers and their heirs. This is not blood money but money that they should have given back. Now that these institutions have been exposed by our representatives, why must we fight with our representatives for proper accounting of monies they won on our behalf?

No leader should be above question nor above reproach lest his or her noble deeds become tarnished with suspicion. Beware of the legacy we leave our children.

The article spelling out the reprehensible actions of the authorities in charge of the claims of Holocaust survivors is noteworthy. It is imperative that there be proper accountability carried out at the very earliest time — legally, honestly and thoroughly.

Enough of the shameful nonsense!

I am not a survivor, nor am I a child of survivors. Yet I found my insides churning as they were touched by the anguish, desperation, and feelings of betrayal expressed by Eli Pfefferkorn in his article.

It is beyond my qualifications to either challenge or corroborate Pfefferkorn's indictment against the Claims Conference for its alleged failure to discharge its responsibilities "with the sensitivity, integrity and responsiveness that the survivors' human situation warrants." However, it is clear that he has made a serious case and that he is not alone in his assessment of the activities of the Claims Conference.

One would hope that the Claims Conference itself would respond, point by point, to Pfefferkorn's allegations, as well as to those made by other serious critics over the years. What is probably required to get at the full truth is a thorough and unbiased inquiry by those organizations that purport to represent the Jewish community, such as World Jewish Congress, International B'nai Brith and UJA Federations. Ideally, such an inquiry should be monitored by a free Jewish press, to the extent that it is, in fact, free.

Within these organizations, a sense of urgency and priority must be felt regarding this matter. As Pfefferkorn wrote, "Time is running out on us at a shocking rate."

Tucked away near the back of your Rosh Hashanah edition was a well-researched, well-documented and well-written essay by Eli Pfefferkorn containing serious and disturbing allegations against the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany. Although you are to be commended for publishing this article in its entirety, surely its content deserves more prominence in your paper.

A Zionist state in 1939

By KENNETH W. STEIN

Finally, the syllabus is finished and the 600-page "documents book" is reproduced and awaits distribution to some 100 students registered to take history/political science/Jewish studies 169, a course called History, Politics and Diplomacy of the Arab-Israeli Conflict.

Spring training for teaching comes each summer when my lecture notes are revised to incorporate new material. My game plan for the first half of the course includes discussion of Arab and Jewish claims to Palestine; how Arab and Jewish communities were different sociologically, economically and demographically; what role the British played in the evolving conflict; what led to the British and then the UN decision to divide Palestine into Arab and Jewish states in 1937 and again in 1947; and finally, what Arab and Jewish populations knew about the struggle to control Palestine as it actually unfolded. The second half of the course will focus on 1948 to the present.

A raft of revelations caught my attention in this year's course re-preparation. One was the origin of the Palestinian historical narrative. It emerged after I read what Usamah al-Baz, one of the Arab world's leading contemporary political analysts and a longtime adviser to Egyptian presidents, said on May 21 this year: "Had not the Nazi crimes been committed against Jews during World War II, the Jewish state would have never come true."

And then the Danish foreign minister, now the president of the European Union, asserted in a July 16 letter to U.S. President George W. Bush that it was not "the Palestinian Arabs... who launched the Holocaust against the Jews. That happened in Europe. [The] inhabitants of Palestine... found themselves looking on as... their country was taken over."

If the aftermath of the Holocaust led to Israel's creation, then the Palestinians can be painted as the victims who were displaced by the Jews who fled Europe. Equally important, Arab leaders and Palestinians themselves would have no complicity in Israel's becoming a state, nor share any of the responsibility for the creation of Palestinian Arab refugees.

Newly-arrived immigrants, part of youth aliyah in the mid-1930's, dance in their new kibbutz community.

Already part of my lectures, reasons why the Zionists won their independence war were the absence of Palestinian leadership, societal fragmentation and economic distress among the vast Palestinian peasant population, the squabbling at the time for the territorial spoils of Palestine between Jordan's King Abdullah and Egypt's King Farouk, and the poor performance of the Arab armies in the 1947-1949 period.

Since 1917, immigrating Jews had slowly established an infrastructure for a state and were protected in their state-building by British strategic needs to control the eastern side of the Suez Canal and its route to India, while preventing French interests in Lebanon and Syria from creeping south. For years, I have made the case that there was a nascent Jewish state in existence by 1939, but this summer's reading added statistical weight to this argument.

According to British parliamentary debates, League of Nations records and A Survey of Palestine (1946), while the Jewish population was only 17 per cent of the total population of Palestine in 1928, Jewish contributions amounted to 44 per cent of the British Palestine administration's revenue. In 1936, the Jews in Palestine contributed more to the Palestine public treasury than did the Arabs. In 1939, the Jewish community represented 31 per cent of the total settled population, yet Jewish capital investment in industry represented 86 per cent of the total net output. In the same year, Jewish workers constituted 79 per cent of the total work force and the salaries and wages paid to Jewish workers were 89 per cent of the total wage bill.

Young people arrive on Kibbutz Ein Harod in 1934. [Encylopedia Judaica photos]

In the inter-war period, in the Jewish sector of Palestine's economy, the ratio of gross investment to gross national product averaged 31.3 per cent per annum, whereas the Arab sector averaged 11.4 per cent. For all the countries in the world, this was estimated as the highest rate of investment of its kind in the first half of the 20th century! The Jewish financial and economic sector grew phenomenally, not from British taxpayer funds or subventions from the British government, nor from British intrusion into the financial or monetary sector to protect the Jewish economy, but from capital imported by Jews for the Jewish economy. Thus, before World War II, capital imported by Jews came primarily from private sources [75 per cent], consisting mostly of immigrant transfers. (See Jacob Metzer, The Divided Economy of Palestine, Cambridge, 1998, pp. 104-115.)

Having read Arabic newspapers published in Palestine in the 1930s and their translations, I jotted down some quotes for my students. These dealt with Arab land sales to Jews. As I re-read them, I wondered if the Danish foreign minister had any clue. I was sure that Usamah al-Baz did, but for political reasons could not acknowledge some of the facts on why or how Palestinians lost their patrimony in the 1930s.

From al-Jami'ah al-Islamiyyah, Aug. 21, 1932 and Sept. 2, 1932, respectively: "because the Jews are alert and our leaders are asleep, the Jews are buying the lands" and "the Arabs will never regard these sales as legal although the Jews possess the titles to these lands... When political conditions change, the Arabs will demand that their lands be given back to them."

From al-Jami'ah al-Arabiyyah, Sept. 16, 1932: "There is no doubt that the question of the sale of land is about one of the greatest dangers that threatens the future of the country."

From al-Difa', Nov. 5, 1934: "The frightened Arab who fears for his future today melts from fear when he imagines his offspring as homeless and as criminals who cannot look at the lands of their fathers."

Barbara Smith in The Roots of Separatism in Palestine: British Economic Policy, 1920-1929 (Syracuse University Press, 1993) asserted that "by the end of the 1930s, the Zionists in Palestine had formed virtually a 'state within a state' with military organization and political, social, economic and financial institutions separate from those of the indigenous population as well as from the British Mandatory Administration."

Chassidic families too in the mid-1920's helped plough the fields, here in Kfar Chassidim near Haifa.

In my own book, The Land Question in Palestine, 1917-1939 (North Carolina Press, 1984), I showed that throughout the period 1920-1939, Jews purchased relatively small amounts of land in Palestine, but enough to create a territory in which the British proposed and then withdrew the idea of establishing Jewish and Arab states in 1937!

Enlightening summer reading! The Zionist state was not handed to the Jews by the international community or by the United Nations out of guilt. Israel was not created simply as a result of European guilt over the Holocaust. Before Adolf Hitler invaded Poland in 1939, Arabs in Palestine knew the political realities in Palestine but lacked capital, organization and unity to compete with a dynamic and goal-oriented Zionist movement. The evidence is startling. And there is more.

How secure is Israel?

I am writing this column on the day after Yom Kippur, when perforce I have returned to the problems of the everyday. Not surprisingly, the list of concerns is headed by the dangers and problems facing Israel.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Public opinion in general believes that Israel is a very strong and secure nation, and that belief is certainly correct to an important degree.

Israel's ultimate security comes from two different sources: its own material strength and the crucial support of world Jewry. We are, in a manner of speaking, the backstop that assures Israel of ultimate security.

I get around the community quite a bit, and from the questions I am asked by its members, I have found there are two main views concerning Israel's fate and future.

One is that regardless of what its enemies will plan and plot, Israel has enough military capability and popular devotion to make it secure in every respect. That sounds reassuring, but it is not entirely correct. While the people of Israel are, in fact, determined to secure their own future, that in itself may, under certain circumstances, not be sufficient.

Another view holds that Israel is quite isolated in the Middle East and that Arab forces might decide Israel is weak and thus mount an attack, which could very well prove to be a mortal threat to the Jewish State. What would prevent such a scenario is the presence of world Jewry and its devotion to making the Jewish State secure in every respect possible.

This is where our own dedication comes into play.

As long as it's clear that we – along with non-Jewish nations and forces that believe in the importance of a Jewish State's existence – are determined to secure Israel under any circumstances, its enemies will hesitate to risk a confrontation.

Since none of us wants Israel to be put to the test, the responsibility for seeing that such a test never happens will remain urgent.

Friends tell me that I have issued this message from time to time, and that my readers may indeed find it repetitive.

So, dear readers, forgive my repetition of this theme. I do not write in order to entertain, but to reinforce convictions that I believe my readers should cherish and embrace.

If that proves to be the case, I am well rewarded, for our future will be more secure in every way.

Hatred knows no boundaries

I hate group e-mails – I find them impersonal at best and the equivalent of pure spam at worst. But when I reluctantly clicked on a group e-mail in my inbox the other day, I found myself propelled into a dizzying state of emotions and thoughts within mere seconds.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

In the e-mail, a young woman named Sara Ahronheim gives her eyewitness account of the riots that occurred at Montreal's Concordia University when former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was scheduled to speak there last month. She asks that her letter be passed on to as many people as possible.

She writes of spending three hours in the auditorium waiting for Netanyahu to speak, but finally being told that he would not be speaking after all.

She writes of emerging into the light outside and being bombarded by the sight of the chaos, the garbage in the street and the sting of the police tear gas unleashed in a weak attempt to control the rioters.

As countless disappointed people exit the building, they sing peace chants together instead of fighting back at the rioters who scream out their hatred and throw bottles at their heads.

In one of humanity's most ancient ways of taunting Jews for their supposed money-grubbing, piles of pennies are chucked at their feet.

Although I myself have never fallen victim to this kind of abuse, the wheels of memory start to turn inside my head.

"Today I saw raw hatred, and it cut me to the core," Ahronheim writes.

And I start to remember some of the times I encountered raw hatred in my life, and the memories come all too easily. The reasons for it weren't always ethnically linked, but the intensity was there all the same. All those little moments suddenly seem much more dangerous when you realize exactly what they could morph into.

I remember in particular a girl who used to taunt me in junior high – who went out of her way to make my life a living hell. She succeeded in turning her friends against me, using that arsenal of whispered rumours and cattiness that so many young girls possess. For years, I believed what they told me – that I was stupid, ugly and unworthy.

Now that I am an adult, my perspective has changed significantly. And when I saw her behind the counter at my favourite coffee shop almost six years later, the unmistakable venom in her eyes as she took my order shook me.

She wasn't sorry for what she had done. She hadn't grown up since those girlish days. My idealistic visions of her begging for my forgiveness remained just that – visions. And it scared me to see that she would do it all over again if she could.

I can remember befriending an Egyptian woman at the bus stop one day.

She was the one who made the first move – she put her hand out to touch my hair, her own concealed underneath a tightly wrapped white shawl, and asked me what kind of dye I used. When I told her it was my natural colour, she gasped and told me I was beautiful. She started chatting with me over the next few weeks as if we were best friends.

One day on the bus, I mentioned in passing that I was getting ready to go on a Birthright trip to Israel. She drew away from me in confusion, asking, "Are you Jewish?" She almost spat out the last word in disgust.

Suddenly the colour of my hair didn't matter anymore. And I felt suddenly exposed – afraid, but also very sad.

At first, the Palestinian protest against Netanyahu's speech at Concordia made me feel, for the first time, ashamed to be Canadian.

Then I realized it is naïve of me to feel surprised this sort of thing could happen in Canada. Hatred knows no boundaries, nor does it recognize any sort of geographical barrier. It's a raw human emotion that makes its first appearance on the playground and unleashes its fangs on the battlefields of life.

While Ahronheim writes of her wishes to fix the rift between the warring factions, I don't think it's going to happen.

Sometimes I think it's hatred, not love, that makes the world go round.

Yom tov away from home

Tradition: so comforting when retained and so refreshing when renewed. The high holy days are always the time when tradition seems to be the most powerful. For my entire life, I have celebrated the holidays in the exact same way, so at the end of the summer, when I made the decision not to be home for the yamim tovim, I wasn't quite sure what the result would be. As it turns out, my decision to stay in Halifax, as opposed to returning to Toronto, was one that taught me an immeasurable amount.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

For Rosh Hashanah, I was invited into three warm and welcoming homes. I was welcomed with open arms for my first Haligonian new year. I received a taste of traditions other than my own, and at tables with families, friends and hungry university students, my concept of Jewish family was broadened. While the gefilte fish may not taste the same as it does at home, the love and devotion that go into it are universal.

The next Friday night, a small group of students and young professionals got together for Shabbat dinner at the bayit, our Jewish Sudents Association house. When I lived in residence last year, a Friday night was hardly something that had a Jewish connotation for me. So to be at the bayit, discussing our distinct perspectives on the culture we all share was both an unexpected and yet thrilling experience. As we expressed our visions for the growth of Jewish student life in our city, my whole concept of Jewish life in Halifax was evolving before my eyes.

Kol Nidre night, my roommates and I hosted our first official heimishe Jewish meal, complete with homemade challah and kugel. There and then, even with the hectic craze of getting to shul on time, we couldn't help but stop to appreciate the Jewish life and family we had created for ourselves.

Yom Kippur itself seemed to fly in a sort of introspective daze. Being away from home gave me the distance to reflect on relationships with family and friends and give true thought to both past and future. Then, with the sound of the shofar, I was thrust right back into Jewish student life.

We were holding a breaking of the fast at the bayit, our first official event of the year. As is the case with every event, you can't help but plan for the best, all the while dreading the worst. After hours of planning, shopping, baking and preparing, we had enough food to feed an army, but I couldn't dismiss my fear that no one would come.

To my surprise and excitement, I entered the bayit after shul to find some 25 new faces already happily munching away. Within half an hour, there were some 50 people there: new smiling faces, students from Dalhousie, King's College and Acadia universities. As people entered, they openly expressed their amazement at the bayit, not to mention the classic Jewish fare that hit the spot after a day of fasting.

For me, that night was the moment of truth. I had to prove both to myself and to the students that this year would be different, that student life would be vibrant and successful. The feelings of accomplishment and sheer joy that ran through me that night cannot be adequately expressed. We succeeded beyond our wildest expectations.

This wasn't the end though. As we enjoyed our bagels and lox, conversation turned to Sukkot. My roommate Naomi declared that we had to have a sukkah of our own. She spent the rest of the week on the phone explaining the concept to every craft and hardware store in Halifax.

Thanks to Naomi's tireless efforts, Friday afternoon a beautiful sukkah stood proudly on our front balcony. Complete with the obligatory paper chains and our Israeli flag, our sukkah became a neighbourhood gathering spot for friends, both Jewish and not.

Had anyone asked me a month ago, how things would have played out for my first yom tov in Halifax, I would not have thought of this tale. While it was hard to relinquish my own family traditions back home, I have to admit that the acquisition of new Haligonian traditions has made for a totally unexpected and fulfilling new year. Of all the lessons I have learned this month, and there have been many, the most resounding has to be that Jewish family can be found wherever you are.

A Palestinian writer appraises Yasser Arafat

Mohammed Abdel Rahman Abdel Raouf Arafat Al Qudua Al Husseini, otherwise known as Yasser Arafat, is a slippery character. Western biographers who have attempted to take the measure of the man, from Alan Hart (Arafat) to Thomas Kiernan (Yasser Arafat, the Man and the Myth), have been confounded by his persona and policies.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Among all the Arab leaders of modern times he stands as the most contradictory," claims his latest biographer, Said Aburish, a Palestinian who was born near Jerusalem, lives in London and holds an American passport.

Arafat, he writes in Arafat: From Defender to Dictator – published by Bloomsbury and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books – is an amalgam of "17th century Arab thinking and today's street smart wisdom…"

Aburish has written a balanced, though iconoclastic, work that goes far in separating fact from fiction. He pays tribute to Arafat's contributions to Palestinian nationalism, but exposes his defects and his mistakes. Thankfully, Arafat is not hagiography.

Although Arafat has tried to perpetuate the myth that his birthplace was Jerusalem, having described himself as "the son of Jerusalem," he was actually born in Cairo, on Aug. 24, 1929. Aburish offers a rational explanation for this discrepancy. In trying to establish his credentials as an authentic Palestinian leader, Arafat could not afford to disclose facts that might diminish his Palestinian identity.

Arafat's half-Egyptian farther was a small-time textile merchant and policeman who moved his family from the Gaza Strip to Cairo in 1927. His mother was a member of an old Muslim family in Jerusalem.

Raised in a traditional Muslim home, Arafat attended Cairo University and was active in Palestinian student circles. On behalf of the Muslim Brotherhood, he bought arms for Arab fighters in Palestine. Arafat fought fearlessly with the Egyptian army in Gaza, but Aburish debunks the myth that he personally knocked out an Israeli armoured column.

In 1949, he began publishing The Voice of Palestine, a polemical magazine that railed against "the Zionist entity, the cancer in our midst." Then he was elected chair of the General Union of Palestinian Students.

Though he was not a compelling public speaker, Arafat could draw on useful qualities. He was a tireless worker, he could coax loyalty out of people and he was supremely self-confident. In other words, Arafat was a great salesman.

He and his friends founded Fatah – the armed wing of the PLO – in Kuwait, where he toiled as a civil engineer. From the outset, he believed that Palestine could be "liberated" only though the barrel of a gun. His model was the successful Arab insurrection in Algeria. "Armed struggle," to him, was a way of keeping the flames of Palestinian nationalism burning.

In 1961, Arafat made his first trip to Syria, the government of which was sympathetic to his cause. During this period, he established contacts with a variety of foreign regimes – China and Cuba, for example – that would be of subsequent assistance.

The PLO was founded in 1964 at an Arab summit. The brainchild of Egyptian leader Gamal Abdel Nasser, it was designed to satisfy Palestinian nationalist aspirations while keeping Palestinians in check. The PLO's first leader, a demagogue named Ahmad Shukeiri, is described by Aburish as "a Palestinian diplomat for hire" who had represented Syria and Saudi Arabia. Yahya Hammouda, a colourless lawyer, replaced Shukeiri in 1968. Arafat, in a stroke of intrigue, supplanted him 1969.

Before he won control of the PLO, Arafat was worried that it would pose too strong a challenge to Fatah. He thereby attempted to undermine the PLO. Aburish claims that Fatah mounted its first raids into Israel in order to preempt the PLO. How ironic.

Yasser Arafat

The 1967 Six Day War was a catastrophic setback for the Arab world, but for Arafat it was a golden opportunity to transform himself, and Fatah, into stellar symbols of Palestinian resistance.

Shortly after the war, Arafat attempted to foment an uprising in the West Bank, which had fallen into Israel's hands. But Arafat ran into a brick wall: the pro-Jordanian powers-that-be there viewed Fatah as a threat to their respective positions. Besides, Israel's security and intelligence apparatus in the West Bank was extremely effective.

After three months, Arafat left the West Bank, joining colleagues in Jordan. From bases in the Jordan Valley, he dispatched infiltrators into Israel. Nearly all were killed by Israeli forces.

Like many observers, Aburish believes that the 1968 battle of Karameh, during which Israel attacked an important Fatah base near the Jordan River, was a turning point in Arafat's fortunes.

Israel destroyed the camp, at a cost of 29 soldiers, and forced the Palestinians to move deeper into Jordan. But after Karameh, which Arafat portrayed as an heroic victory, volunteers from all over the Middle East and elsewhere flocked to join Fatah, while Arab governments increased their financial support for the Palestinians.

Arafat's reaction to the plague of airline hijackings that convulsed the Middle East in the late 1960 and 1970s was typical of his modus operandi. He eventually condemned the hijackings, but took no action to stop them. (Shades of his response to Hamas and Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades terrorism).

"Arafat's handling of hijackings was indeed cynical," Aburish observes. "He wanted the benefits, yet rejected these acts when speaking to the world media or Arab leaders."

As well, Aburish criticizes Arafat for having broken the agreement under which the PLO was permitted to operate in Jordan. In violation of Jordanian laws, the PLO created its own police force and courts, and Arafat refused to control "the loutish, high-handed behaviour" of his fighters – a mistake he would repeat in Lebanon. Arafat, he notes, could not imagine that King Hussein would have the temerity to confront the PLO.

In line with his belief that Israel should be replaced by a secular state, Arafat stifled all initiatives by local West Bank Palestinians to reach an accommodation with the Jewish state. But after concluding that a military victory over Israel was impossible, he quietly let it be known that he was not opposed to a peaceful solution, and allowed the PLO representative in London to publish a series of articles advocating a two-state solution.

When hardliners questioned this tactic, he denied responsibility or feigned ignorance. Be that as it may, he appointed an aide, Bassam Abu Sharif, to enter into negotiations with Israel. This occurred in July 1987, five months before the eruption of the first intifadah. At first, Arafat did not commit to the uprising, thinking it might be a flash in the pan. But when he realized it would not fizzle out, he co-opted it under the aegis of the PLO.

Some of the most captivating material in this intriguing book turns on two topics: Arafat's decision to begin a dialogue with the United States after saying that he recognized Israel's existence and renounced terrorism, and his brief alliance with Iraq, whom he saw as a military counterweight to Israel.

Aburish's discussion of the events surrounding the Oslo peace process is edifying, and his appraisal of Oslo as a political triumph for Arafat is credible. But Aburish has a dubious opinion of Oslo, claiming it was a one-sided agreement that left Israel completely in charge. In addition, Aburish is of the opinion that Benjamin Netanyahu's election in 1996 as Israel's prime minister was "a low point" for Arafat, given Netanyahu's fundamental hostility to Oslo.

Since Arafat was published before the collapse of the Camp David summit and the outbreak of the second intifadah, both of which occurred in 2000, we will have to wait for a revised and updated edition of Aburish's views of those momentous events.

But in the meantime, readers will learn much from Aburish concerning Arafat's personal shortcomings and his tolerance of corruption.

Arafat, he writes, is a self-promoting and hands-on administrator with "dictatorial tendencies" whose " blind spots" range from the compulsion to act independently to the misguided belief that Arab states will protect him from the consequences of his behaviour. Yet Arafat's major shortcoming is also his strength: his view that he alone is capable of realizing Palestinian ambitions. Summing up Arafat, whom he claims is "best" under pressure, Aburish says he is "a throwback to another age – the age of a brave, uneducated, wily Arab chief."

In another critique, Aburish accuses Arafat of tolerating corruption and of cushioning himself behind a layer of yes-men and sycophants. In a final blast, he calls for his replacement.

Considering what has happened of late, from the abrupt resignation of Arafat's cabinet in mid-September to Israel's virtual destruction of his headquarters in Ramallah last week, Aburish's book must be music to the ears of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. President George W. Bush.

Glueckel's seven little books

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

If, as historian Jacob Shatzky observed in 1926, catastrophe of one sort or another has been the usual impetus for the bulk of Jewish autobiographical writing, the celebrated chronicles left to us by Glueckel of Hamelin (1646-1724) are no exception.

Roots & Remembrance

The pious Glueckel took up her quill in 1689 after the accidental death of her beloved husband, Chaim Segal of Hamelin, who succumbed to internal injuries after falling on a slippery pavement. Beginning with the aim of "distracting my soul from the burdens laid upon it," she wrote seven small books of memoirs over many years, strictly for the benefit of her dozen children.

Hailed as the first autobiography in Jewish letters by a woman, Glueckel's memoirs provide a warm, intimate and unique glimpse of her family and commercial affairs over an extended period. She writes with great candour, whether the subject is finding desirable matches and dowries for her children, or suitable partners and equity for new business ventures. She possessed a shrewd business sense and was deeply involved in most of Chaim's mercantile activities despite the demands of motherhood.

"In its graphic account of intimate experiences, its lively sketches of character, its warm humour and frank self-revelation, [Glueckel's life] not only throws a flood of light on the period but also introduces a plucky, intelligent, independent woman whom it would have been a joy to know," writes anthologist Leo W. Schwarz, who included a chapter of her narrative in his anthology, Memoirs Of My People: Jewish Self-Portraits from the 11th to the 20th Centuries (Schocken edition, 1963).

Like Anne Frank's legendary diary, Glueckel's highly readable memoir falls into a category of literature that the Encyclopedia Judaica calls "unconscious autobiography" – that is, writing not meant for publication. Reflecting her unconscious and unliterary approach, she frequently dips her pen into the meditative ink of devotional parables, Talmudic lore and sayings from the popular Yiddish ethical books of the day, as if wanting to instruct her children as well as leave them a better sense of their family's dealings in the world.

Surprisingly, the book was kept within the relatively narrow circle of her own family for two centuries. What is less surprising is the level of discussion and scholarship it aroused after its initial publication in 1896. It has been reprinted numerous times since.

Living in Hamburg, Glueckel and Chaim were connected by blood or marriage to many leading German-Jewish families of the day, and her narrative contains enough genealogical information to allow roots-minded readers to sketch out an extensive family tree. The book has proven invaluable to numerous contemporary researchers seeking information about their lineages.

Most likely, Glueckel couldn't have imagined that the seven little books she penned for her children's edification would ever have merited publication, the attention of thousands of readers, and a hallowed place on the shelf of Jewish autobiographical literature. She stands today as a fine model for anyone with the notion that their knowledge of family history is worth recording.

Over the years, I've had the good fortune to attain copies of several unpublished essays, typewritten or scrawled by hand, that relatives have left to posterity. A few have even seen their reminiscences into print. I've always been enormously impressed by the industriousness and generosity of people who diligently record their own and their family's saga for the benefit of future generations.

One wife too many

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

All the way back, beginning with our patriarchs, then on to King David, King Solomon and on, Jewish men, indeed all men, freely married and maintained multiple women as wives.

As difficult to comprehend as this may be today, bigamy, or even polygamy, was once commonplace. It was simply the accepted norm, both morally and socially. Biblical law completely condones a man being wed to more than one wife at the same time.

Through A Sephardi Window

Rabbeinu Gershon was a leader of mythical proportions who lived in Germany about 1,000 years ago. His legacy to the Jewish people is felt to this day. It was he who united the rabbis of his era to formalize a ban against polygamy. Today, this is seen as a concession to the times. In much the same way, the Mormon Church distances itself from this very practice, even though it was the very reason for its birth as a church and was clearly sanctioned by its founder.

At the turn of the first millennium, the world was just coming out of the dark ages. The issue of polygamy was seen by the European populace as primitive and as a pagan throwback. Judaism had to follow suit. Intense social and political pressure, as well as the general negative perception, brought about this change. Jews in Europe were also marrying just one wife. Rabbeinu Gershon and his rabbis essentially formalized the then-current practice of monogamy as a sensible and enlightened one.

What was true in Europe and continues to remain so in the western world was not the case elsewhere. In the world of Islam, the Qu'ran, like the Torah, permits a man to have several wives. For Islam, the turn of the millennium was not an awakening. In fact, Islam then saw itself, and rightfully so, as progressive and enlightened.

The practice of polygamy in Islam is well established, accepted and practised to this very day. This is not particular to Islam, but true for other cultures as well. Hence, Sephardi Jews never felt compelled to "update" their practices. There was neither pressure nor stigma associated with polygamy. Sephardi Jews, like their Muslim neighbours, continued with their lives as usual. The ban in Germany of Rabbeinu Gershon was not accepted by Sephardi Jews in Muslim countries.

Until contemporary times, it was not unheard of, and it was certainly not looked down upon by the community (by either men or women), for a household to have more than one wife if they so chose.

With the establishment of the modern State of Israel, monogamy became enshrined in law. Within this legislation however, a clause was inserted to allow and recognize those immigrants who brought more than one wife with them.

The case of monogamy versus polygamy is an excellent example that illustrates the difference between the Sephardim and the Ashkenazim, a difference in practice that is based on historical and geographical forces.

It illustrates how Judaism is one religion that took two routes through time and place, but yet remained one religion.

Jewish Life

Making sense of the Jewish Diaspora

Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits*, By Allan Levine, McClelland & Stewart, 2002, $36.99

Books
Bernard Baskin

When did the Jewish Diaspora begin? It's all a matter of perspective. For Allan Levine, a Winnipeg novelist and historian, it begins – at least for the purposes of his book – with the expulsion from Spain in 1492.

Levine approaches Jewish history in a singular and original manner. In snapshot fashion he describes ten diverse Jewish communities: Seville, Venice, Amsterdam, Constantinople, Vienna, St. Petersburg, Paris, Vilna, Kiev and New York. Each represents a distinctive era in the Diaspora.

For every time period, he focuses on individuals who shaped and moulded the Jewish experience. Some of these influential personalities time were rabbis, teachers and writers, others were merchants, physicians and religious zealots.

In their widespread dispersion, Jews often fell under the yoke of Islam. The author indicates that from 1453 onward, almost until the fall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century, religious persecution by the sultans and their officials against Jews was minimal. Pressure to convert to Islam was minor, particularly when compared to events in Spain, France, and the rest of the Christian-controlled continent. Among the influential doctors in the court of Suleiman "The Magnificent," whose reign lasted from 1521-1566, was Moses Hamon, the scion of a distinguished and honoured Jewish family.

How can we understand the dramatic rise and fall of Shabbetai Zevi (1626-1676) the infamous false messiah? In May 1665, Zevi proclaimed himself the messiah and predicted that the day of judgement would arrive on June 18, 1666. His followers, in a mad frenzy, sold their homes and businesses, prayed, fasted, held parades and named their children Shabbetai.

This collective madness came to an end when he was arrested and given a simple choice: Convert to Islam or die. He became Aziz Mehmed Effendi. It took decades for Jews to recovers from this debacle. Some, contrary to all reason, continued to believe in him and his mission, which they believed would one day achieve fruition.

More than 200 years later, the notorious Dreyfus affair, politically speaking, split France in two. It was almost impossible for a French citizen to be progressive without being for Dreyfus – and it was equally impossible to be pro-Church and pro-army without being against him.

So assimilated was Dreyfus that in his memoirs he does not even indicate that he was born a Jew. Likewise, in the numerous letters he wrote from his prison hut on Devil's Island, he never mentioned that it was anti-Semitism that was mostly responsible for the tragic injustice done to him.

The book's final chapter deals with Jewish life today and in the recent past. Levine describes the influence of Abraham Cahan, legendary editor of the Forward, which at its zenith had a readership of half a million. When Cahan died in 1951 at the age of 91, more than 10,000 mourners lined up at the Forward Building to hear the eulogies of politicians and dignitaries.

Levine concludes his accessible, colourful and never boring narrative with this observation: "To be a Jew in North America in the 21st century – or in Spain at the time of the exile, or in France when Alfred Dreyfus was sent to Devil's Island – is to be blessed with a special burden. Seeking life's true meaning and coming to terms with the Jewish condition as it pertains to each new age – this is part of the mystery of the Jewish people and always will be."

Brit milah & the Internet - Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Mazel tov. It's a girl!

Mazel tov. It's a boy!

If you are expecting to hear those words in the near future, then you may also want to think about the festivities that follow shortly after the birth. There are many wonderful Web sites that can provide you with a wealth of information and advice about the brit (or bris) milah ceremony for boys and the newer simchat bat celebrations for girls. We'll look at some of the best.

This week, the boys.

In the book of Genesis, we read about one of the cornerstone commandments given from God to Abraham and the Jewish people: "This is My covenant which you shall keep between Me and you and your descendants after you: every male among you shall be circumcised." (Genesis 17:10) [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?action=displaypage&book=1&chapter=17&verse=10&portion=3]

Just why is a Jewish circumcision considered such a joyous ceremony? According to Circumcision.net [http://www.circumcision.net/Joy.htm], the brit milah represents the Jews' eternal bond to God. It is the choicest of offerings, offering oneself (the physical body and the mind) to the service of the Creator. Also, look at the LifeCycles essay on this topic. [http://www.torah.org/learning/lifecycles/milah/milah1.html]

But why on the eighth day (for healthy boys)? Rabbi Yehuda Lebovics of Los Angeles offers a spiritual explanation [http://www.torahview.com/bris/html/the_bris.html]: "The kabbalistic writings teach us that seven days represent the physical world of creation. Thus, when a child has lived for eight days, he has transcended the physical to the metaphysical. The covenant joining body and soul, physical and spiritual, can now take place." If you would like to read the actual halachot of brit milah, see an incredibly detailed site which lists the laws of circumcision in both English and Hebrew. [http://imohel.com/texts.htm]

The controversy over performing circumcisions is not a new one. There are many Web sites that deal with the issue, such as one called Intactiyism. [http://www.circumstitions.com/] In the article, "Bris Milah: Beautiful or Barbaric?" Rabbi Shraga Simmons explains the importance of the commandment and surveys some of the medical research that supports the procedure. [http://www.aish.com/literacy/lifecycle/bris_milah_beautiful_or_barbaric$.asp]

Of course, preparing for a brit can be stressful. California's Dr. Fred Kogen provides a helpful checklist [http://www.beritmila.com/setup.html]. Practical tips include such things as making sure the mohel has a parking space, feeding the baby until the mohel arrives in the house, preparing a pillow for the Chair of Elijah, and being sure to disconnect the telephone during the service.

If you've attended a brit but have been afraid to take a peek at the events, you can look in – thanks to the Net. Don't worry. All the photos at Mohel Zachary Hepner's site are shot from a safe distance. [http://imohel.com/ceremony.htm]

Although not strictly an article solely about circumcision, I would like to conclude with an excerpt from a touching piece by Jeff Jacoby, a columnist for the Boston Globe, with his wishes to his newborn son, Caleb. [http://www.jfl mail.com/articles/166.html]

"You are so tiny, little one. You have so much growing to do. As I cradle you in my arms or watch you sleep in your crib, I pray that life brings you vigour and health, delight and fortune. Like every parent, I want you to do well. But more than anything else, I want you to do good. Sixteen days ago, you entered this world. One day – far in the future, I hope – you will leave it. If I could wish for only one thing, it would be this: that you leave it better than you found it."

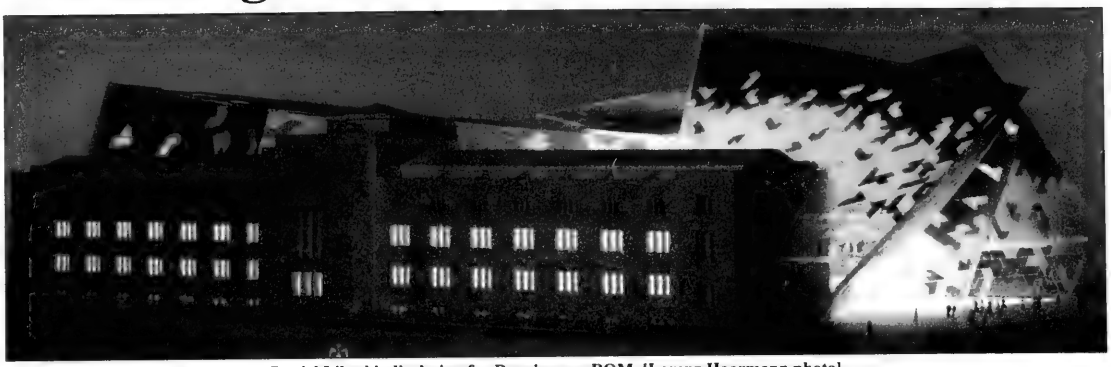
Architect leading ROM into the 21st century

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter



Daniel Libeskind's design for Renaissance ROM. [Lorenz Haarmann photo]

The Crystal, Daniel Libeskind's design for the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM), will help bring the museum into the 21st century, the architect says.

Libeskind's architectural plans for the ROM were selected in February, as part of a project that will revitalize the area around Bloor Street and Avenue Road and position the museum within an arts and cultural centre.

The Royal Conservatory of Music, the Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art, the Bata Shoe Museum and parts of the University of Toronto will be included in the redevelopment.

"Aspects of the traditional buildings will be renovated and vistas will be opened up... it will bring a new life to the ROM," Libeskind said in a recent interview at the museum.

"The Royal Ontario Museum isn't just a building," the architect said.

It's a cornerstone of Toronto with a historical development that began at the turn of the century and has evolved over the years to reflect the development of Ontario and Canada, he said.

The project will eventually convert the museum from a "labyrinth of complicated galleries" and "black box experiences" into an international museum that Libeskind predicts will attract people from all over the world.

"The museum will offer an unprecedented display of collections in distinctive spaces."

The building's new entrance on Bloor Street will change what Libeskind described as "the current dark hole on a desolate corner of two streets anywhere in North America" into a more inviting "experience for visitors."

The award-winning Polish-born Israeli-American architect is married to Torontonian Nina Lewis and they currently live with their family in Berlin. Libeskind calls himself the quintessential "wandering Jew."

The couple have three children – each born in a different place. Lev Jacob, 24, was born in Toronto, Noam Isaac, 22, in Detroit and Rachel, 13, in Milano, Italy.

Born in Lodz in 1946 to Holocaust survivors, Libeskind moved to Israel with his family in the late 1950s and studied music. At the age of 13, he won the America-Israel Music Prize for his work as a virtuoso. At 17, he moved from Israel to the United States and began to study architecture.

At Camp Hemshekh, a Yiddish socialist camp in New York, Libeskind met Nina, the daughter of David Lewis, New Democratic Party leader from 1971 to 1975.

In July, Libeskind was selected as the first holder of the Gehry Architectural Chair at the University of Toronto and last year, he was the first architect to win the Hiroshima Art Prize for work promoting peace.

Libeskind designed Jewish Museum in Berlin

Manchester, England, are recurring images in many of Libeskind's projects.

In his war museum designs, Libeskind said he moves away from trends that glorify weaponry and uses "broken shards to emphasize the catastrophic nature of conflict."

The Jewish Museum in Berlin, designed by Libeskind, opened in September 2001 to replace the original destroyed by the Nazis. The museum traces the history of the Jews in Germany from Roman times through the current German Jewish revival.

The outside of the building contains irregular lines that leave disturbing voids in the otherwise smooth glass. Inside, the museum houses a Holocaust tower with a concrete chamber at its centre.

The building, which has already attracted almost one million visitors since it opened, is meant to communicate several messages and "to connect intellectually and emotionally," Libeskind said.

Daniel Libeskind

The museum's architecture and content portray the complex nature of Jewish German history – the achievements of Jews in Germany, the void that was left by the Holocaust and the current challenges that Berlin, Germany and Europe face in integrating this history into their future, he said.

Although it is difficult for a child of Holocaust survivors, Libeskind felt it was important for him to live in Berlin while the museum was being built.

Life in Berlin brought him face-to-face with positive and negative aspects of German culture.

The bat mitzvah of his daughter, Rachel, at the Oranienburger Strasse Synagogue, was the first bat mitzvah ever to be celebrated in a synagogue destroyed during the war.

On the other hand, Libeskind said that over the years, he has been the subject of several anti-Semitic articles.

Libeskind said he sees himself as a spokesperson for Jewish ideas. He is often interviewed on television about the government of Germany and its relationship with Israel and the current wave of anti-Semitism in Europe.

Now, Libeskind feels it's time for another move. "I'm not sure where I'm moving next, but it will be somewhere unexpected."

legacy of life

Lewis Moses 1919 – 1999

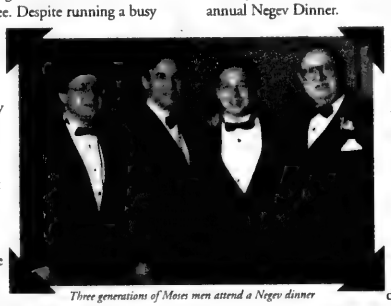
When it came to the welfare of the Jewish people, there was no stopping Lewis Moses.

Mr. Moses – known affectionately as Captain Zaida by the neighbourhood children – was recognized as a man of action throughout Toronto's Jewish community. When a Jewish school needed funds, Mr. Moses established scholarships. When Israel was suffering, Mr. Moses ordered the sanctuary doors locked during his State of Israel Bonds appeal until he was satisfied with the dollars raised. And when the neighbourhood kids wanted to learn how to make the bracha over a lulav and etrog, their beloved Captain Zaida in his trademarked sailor's cap patiently taught each of them how to fulfill the important mitzvah.

"My Dad taught me to work for my community by giving of my time and money," says son Sam Moses. "He always said that it was easy to write a cheque but if everybody gave a cheque there wouldn't be anybody to do the work. He was a big believer in seeing all the money go to the cause. By drafting lay people, he said, organizations could eliminate their overhead and direct funds where they're needed most."

Lewis Moses made it his business to help out wherever he could. He came by it honestly, having grown up in a family that was extremely devoted to Jewish life. His father Isadore Moses, a deeply religious man, brought the family to Ottawa in 1928 and settled in downtown Toronto several years later. The Moses' door was always open, with many Hungarian Jews sitting down to their very first meal on Canadian soil at the Moses' home. Isadore became president of Toronto's Husiatiner Klaus Shul, volunteered to co-design Bathurst Lawn Cemetary's floor plan, and was committed to Jewish education.

Lewis, the youngest of seven children, didn't fall far from the tree. Despite running a busy chartered accountancy practice, the former air force officer devoted much of his energy to Jewish causes. He worked diligently for the Zionist Revisionist Organization, United Jewish Appeal, United Israel Appeal, State of Israel Bonds, Jewish National Fund, Canadian Zionist Federation, the Board of Jewish Education, Eitz Chaim Schools, and many other organizations. He was co-founder of Torath Emeth Congregation and a Board Member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, both in Toronto.



Three generations of Moses men attend a Negev dinner

"My Dad was busy 26 hours a day," recalls daughter Harriet Altman. "I don't know how he did it. Yet even with such a hectic schedule, he was a very loyal son who went to his mother's house for lunch every day. And he was always put Shabbat aside for his family."

Mr. Moses' fundraising efforts for both Jewish and non-Jewish organizations earned him much praise, and in 1992 he was feted at the annual Negev Dinner.

"He never refused anyone who came to his door, even if they weren't Jewish," says Sam of his father's charitable nature. The family still chuckles about the time a Seventh Day Adventist came a-knockin'. The outgoing Mr. Moses handed over a few dollars, only to be inundated later with a busload of missionaries thinking they'd found an easy convert.

But Mr. Moses was steadfast in his love for Israel and all things Jewish. A proud Herut-Likud member, Mr. Moses and his wife Ethel visited Israel every chance they could and counted former Prime Minister Menachem Begin as a personal friend.

"Many years before Israel became a state Lew was pushing for its creation," says longtime friend Ben Prossin, Executive Director of Jewish National Fund of Canada. "He had strong feelings for Jewish peoplehood and Jewish nationhood and was a strong believer in what Menachem Begin stood for. He was a very generous and giving fellow with a wonderful outgoing personality, and people who came into contact with him genuinely liked him. He was simply a wonderful guy."

Adds Harriet: "When my daughter applied to dental school they asked her who her mentor was and who she admired the most," she said, "My grandfather. He fought for his country. He did so much community work that it was unbelievable. He had a strong family life. And he was successful in his career. That's what I truly aspire to..."

Torontonians help Israeli honour his son

Countless Torontonians who have been to Israel over the years will recognize Ezra Eini, a long time tour guide. If it's not his face they remember, it's his love and knowledge of Israel which quickly rubs off on everyone he meets.

For Ezra Eini, much of that passion temporarily faded when, in the early morning of February 20, 2002, an ominous knock on his front door changed everything.

He was told that his 22-year-old son, Moshe, an IDF captain, had been killed by Palestinian terrorists at a checkpoint near Ramallah, hours earlier.

"In a split-second, life turned upside down," says Eini. "Right after the death of my son, my view of life changed drastically. There was a huge hole in my heart, a hole that can only be filled by my incredible family, and by moving forward to a better life, a better future."

That's what Ezra, his wife, Nurit, a high-school teacher in Ramat Gan, and their sons have been trying to do ever since.

During his short life, Moshe Eini was a keen sportsman who enjoyed a variety of sports, most notably, rock climbing and basketball.

To honour their late son, Ezra and Nurit established a sports centre in his memory. The Moshe (Moishale) Eini Sports Centre will stand on the campus of the Rest & Recreation Centre for Combat Soldiers in Ashkelon.

Joining with individual donors, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has already contributed $100,000 to the fund responsible for the centre. Most of these donations came from Toronto men and women who have participated in UJA solidarity missions over the years, and came to know and love Ezra Eini.

The centre gives about 600 soldiers per day the chance to take a break from their military duties. It includes residential accommodations, a games room, swimming pool, and much more. The new sports centre will include two basketball courts, a tennis court, a handball court, and a soccer field.

> "our spirit has not been broken"

Another way in which Eini is "moving forward" is by telling his story to various North American communities, including a Canadian visit which brings him to UJA Federation from October 2 to October 4. These cathartic visits are how he expresses his gratitude to fellow Jews in the Diaspora.

"I want to come to Toronto and tell everyone who cares so much about us, just what is going on in Israel, through my eyes," he says. "I want them to know that after two years of this horrible situation, our spirit has not been broken. Maybe we turn our heads around a bit more when we walk on the street, but people are trying to get back to normal as soon as possible."

Ezra Eini

Eini feels that ongoing Diaspora support is more important to Israelis than most people might think.

"You can't believe how much Israelis need you," Eini asserts. "The fact that Israel can hold the hand of the Diaspora is everything to us. For me, knowing that you in Toronto are thinking about us is like an infusion of oxygen, it means that we are never alone."

Real estate community fills Sheraton

According to acclaimed Canadian economist, Dr. Sherry Cooper, the "world of risk" we currently live in has resulted in low investor confidence.

Dr. Cooper was one of three speakers at a recent UJA Federation Real Estate Cabinet program, attended by more than 500 people – Jews and non-Jews alike – at Toronto's Sheraton Centre Hotel.

The evening's other speakers were Peter Gilgan of Mattamy Homes Ltd., and Robert Julien, president of Kolter Property Company.

According to a National Post survey, Dr. Cooper, a regular guest on CNN, CNBC, CBC, and CTV, is considered the third most influential woman in Canada.

Citing the ongoing situation in the Middle East as well as a possible attack against Iraq by the United States, Dr. Cooper said, "consumer confidence is at a very low ebb with the fear of an all-out war in the United States".

"What concerns me the most," said Dr. Cooper, "is not the business sector right now, but the cracks on the consumer side, including an increase in personal bankruptcies."

UJA Federation's Real Estate Cabinet is composed of Toronto developers, real estate professionals, homebuilders, and suppliers.

This year, a group of over 60 fundraising volunteers from all sectors of the real estate industry will raise over $4.5 million from more than 1,500 donors as part of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003.

Leonard Abramsky (l) and Richard Diamond

"This evening was a tremendous success," says Leonard Abramsky, who, along with Richard Diamond, chaired the event. "It continues to grow and is now viewed as one of the premier real estate events in Toronto."

"First of all, it's great to see such a turn-out from the Toronto-at-large real estate community, 30 per cent of whom were non-Jews. Through this event we educate people on Israel's current situation, update them on Campaign 2003, and bring a greater understanding of real estate and the economy."

Minding their business

Plans are underway for a new UJA Federation initiative, and for Jewish men and women with big business aspirations, it's an idea whose time has come.

When brought to fruition, UJA's Jewish Chamber of Commerce, will be all about providing Toronto's Jewish community with an opportunity to build and develop a network of outstanding business contacts.

> "It produces new community leaders"

An event-driven initiative, its objective will be achieved through business networking opportunities, and programs co-sponsored by UJA and various Toronto business organizations.

Toronto's Jewish Chamber of Commerce is modeled after a similar initiative in Montreal which originated in 1995 and has already held over 50 successful events with keynote speakers such as Michael Bregman, then CEO of Second Cup, and Laurent Beaudoin, the former CEO of Bombardier.

The man behind Montreal's success is Richard Wajs, chair of the new Toronto Jewish Chamber of Commerce who came here in 1997 and saw the great potential to set up shop.

"The early feedback in Toronto has been tremendous," says Wajs, 38, a former practicing lawyer who has worked with major international banks. "The Board is made up of 22 people from a variety of professions and industries. We have everyone from merchant bankers to CEOs and entrepreneurs."

Richard Wajs

"It was very successful in Montreal with more than 500 members so far, and I know that it'll be a hit here. It produces new community leaders, and it's really a great way for community members to help themselves," adds Wajs.

The inaugural Jewish Chamber of Commerce event, scheduled for November 6th, 2002 will feature Issy Sharp, Chairman and CEO of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts.

Service for a slain daughter

By Chen Kotes -Bar, Ma'ariv

Among those receiving certificates of merit for volunteering to do reserve duty, at a recent IDF ceremony, was Eli (Eliya) Polonsky, a soldier with a mission. Plonsky's daughter, Kochava z"l, was killed in a hit-and-run terror attack, some 18 months ago. She had five months left to serve until her release from the army, and her father decided to complete what she couldn't. At age 50, he volunteered for the military reserves, and over the last four months he has served three times, 35 days in all. Brigadier General Yitzhak Eitan, awarded Pvt. Eli Polonsky the rank of Private First Class. The audience in the hall stood up and applauded and Polonsky himself wiped away a tear.

"I thought about Kochava," he says. "She had five months left to serve; it was so important to her, but she never got the chance to finish her service. Therefore, I'm doing the time for her. It's what she would have wanted me to do. People think I'm contributing something to the army, but it's just the opposite – the army has contributed something to me. Reserve duty has saved me. This is where I became rehabilitated, where I began living again, laughing again, where I was reborn. I see the soldiers and imagine Kochava among them. I didn't leave the house for over a year after the catastrophe. Now, thanks to my reserve service, I can breathe again."

Eli Polonsky, who was born in Kishinev, immigrated to Israel in 1978, with his then wife and their eldest son, settling in Ashkelon, where Kochava (Kochi) was born. The couple also have another child, a 16-year-old boy.

On February 14th, 2001, Kochava Polonsky left her mother's home in Ashkelon. She took a bus from the city's central station to the Ezor Junction, where she was supposed to take another bus to her army base. As she was walking toward the stop, a bus driven by a terrorist jumped the curb and struck her from behind. She was killed instantly.

"I was sitting at home at the time," says Eli, reconstructing the scene. "I turned on the television and heard them announcing a terror attack at the Ezor Junction. I knew that was where Kochava took the bus. I knew her route. I picked up the telephone and started dialing her cellular phone. She didn't answer. I kept ringing her – there was no answer. Nothing. I understood my daughter is dead."

About four months ago, Eli Polonsky was sitting in front of the TV watching an IDF officer speaking about a volunteer reserve program.

"They gave a telephone number to call, and I immediately rang up," he recalls. "I understood that this would save me, rehabilitate me, that this was how I could complete what Kochava could not. At long last, I felt I had a goal, a future, something to live for."

Ronnie Appleby (l) and Howard Sokolowski (r) at the launch of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003.

The North American Federation-wide Israel Emergency Campaign organized by United Jewish Communities (UJC) in April 2002, has already surpassed its original goal of $300 million U.S. UJC is the umbrella organization for Jewish Federations across North America.

The impressive UJC total is over $340 million U.S. from American and Canadian donors. Close to $20 million (Cdn) comes from Toronto, where UJA Federation played a strong role in creating the North American fundraising effort.

"The North American campaign is a wonderful example of the how much we, as Jews, can accomplish when we work together," says Howard Sokolowski, Campaign chair, along with Ronnie Appleby, of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. "Hundreds of thousands of Jews across North America are coming together as one entity for the sole purpose of helping Israel."

"It's a role model for others"

"We refer numerous communities to examine Toronto's campaign, because it's a role model for others," says Mike Fischer, Senior Consultant with UJC in New York.

One way UJC measures campaign success is based on a simple ratio of donors to population, and Toronto counts 144 donors per 1,000 Jewish citizens. Pretty impressive numbers when you consider that Boston comes in at 76 per 1,000, Miami at 92, and Los Angeles with 59.

Those numbers place Toronto in the top 10 per cent of all North American Federations, and number three behind New York and Chicago in total fundraising dollars.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 which is now entering the home stretch, stands at $56 million, with more than $19 million designated for Israel's emergency needs.

Challenges surrounding double cohort year examined

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Parents, students and schools need to get organized and start planning – the double cohort is about to enter the college and university application process.

This is the year the first wave of Grade 12 students in the new Ontario secondary school program will be graduating at the same time as the last Grade 13 students. Many will soon begin applying for the next stage of their education.

While the Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities has guaranteed "a place for every willing and qualified student," it is likely that fewer applicants than usual will get their university, college or program of first choice.

At a meeting sponsored by Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto (JVS) last week, four education professionals discussed the challenges currently facing these students.

JVS senior psycho-educational consultant Joy Koplowitz, JVS senior career consultant Jane Rendely and educational consultants Judy Libman and Judy Winberg explained some of the issues.

Since the number of positions available in some programs next year may not be sufficient to meet the doubled demand, Winberg suggested students consider alternative routes to their career goals.

Some students could decide to take another year of high school. Others may apply out of province, Winberg said.

The path to university shouldn't be rigid and students could pursue job shadowing programs and internship opportunities.

However, if students decide to pursue the university application process, they should continuously check the accuracy of their information. "We are in a state of constant change," Winberg said. "Don't rely on what you hear from your friends."

Rendely encouraged students to remember that pursuing a career is an explorative process that takes time.

Each high school student should consider several possible career opportunities and she recommended gathering information about potential paths that will match "your values and personal style."

For those with special needs, Koplowitz recommended finding universities and colleges that will accommodate different learning styles.

An assessment can help students focus on their strengths and weaknesses, she said.

Plan to attend the various university and college fairs that will be taking place over the next few weeks, Libman told the group.

Use the time to ask questions about the schools and when it comes time to fill out application forms, "don't confuse preconceived ideas with real facts," Libman warned.

"Prestige names" may not always be the best place for a quality education that will meet your needs, she said.

Look for schools that offer some small classes so that students can get to know their professors, she advised.

It's important to feel comfortable at your school, so be sure to visit the campuses and investigate each culture, she said.

Libman pointed out to the students in the group that at this point in their lives, they don't have to have all the answers to questions about their future goals.

Bookstore says no to Jewish buttons

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto Women's Bookstore has refused an offer by National Council of Jewish Women Toronto section and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, to supply the store with buttons that read "Stop the Homicide Bombings."

The offer came in response to the bookstore's decision to carry buttons that read "End the Occupation Now," which are designed with a Palestinian flag containing a stylized blue-and-white logo representing the women's movement, as well as the acronym WAO (for Women Against the Occupation) in blue letters below the flag.

Anjula Gogia, co-manager of the store, said it was decided not to carry the buttons "because we feel the buttons we do carry do not only express one side." The pins being sold by the bookstore contain a women's symbol in the colours of the Israeli flag, "and we feel [the pins] represent a plurality of positions," Gogia said.

"As a bookstore we condemn suicide bombings and we support movements for peace in Israel, Palestine and around the world."

But Len Rudner, CJC Ontario's director of community relations, said he did not pick up that the women's symbol on the button is depicted in blue and white, and "if we showed this button to 10,000 people, not one would say it was about Israel."

A sin by dereliction

This is the fourth in a series of articles on drug abuse in the Jewish community. We have chosen to end the series with this article by the renowned scholar, Rabbi Abraham Twerski, to emphasize the importance of education about addiction, for all members of our community.

By RABBI ABRAHAM J. TWERSKI, MD

The Talmud states that an unintentional sin committed by a scholar is equivalent to an intentional sin, because the scholar, who is in possession of knowledge, should have known better. In his case, ignorance is not a defence.

Lay people are not necessarily scholars, nor is their counsel frequently sought. Rabbis, on the other hand, are learned and are considered authorities who can provide proper counsel. If they fail to do so because of lack of adequate knowledge, even though their intentions were good, they are held responsible as though it were an intentional transgression. I therefore suspect that "Yoatznu ra" (we have given bad counsel), a confession we make in the Viduy (confessional prayer) on Yom Kippur, is a confession intended for rabbis.

I have had considerable experience with cases brought before rabbis for advice and guidance, where, due to inadequate knowledge, the rabbis have given advice that has turned out to be extremely harmful. There are many problems in the Jewish community of which rabbis may be unaware, such as addictive gambling, alcoholism and/or drug addiction, spousal abuse, child abuse and other social ills. For some reason, there is a misconception that these do not occur among Jews, and certainly not among observant Jews.

Couples have come to the rabbi with marital problems, and no inquiry is made as to whether there is a problem of alcohol or substance abuse. Both men and women are susceptible to alcoholism, and there is fairly widespread abuse of prescription drugs, which can be every bit as devastating as heroin and cocaine. Incidentally, the latter occurs, even among some of the finest families.

Drug Abuse in the Jewish Community

Furthermore, there are families who are in financial straits, and it does not occur to the rabbi to inquire about the possibility of addictive gambling.

Spouses and children may be victims of both physical and emotional abuse, and this may go unsuspected. One battered wife complained, "Our rabbi would never believe it if I told him about my husband's behaviour at home. On the outside he is an absolute tzaddik, and if I told the rabbi about how he mistreats me, the rabbi would think I am fabricating and consider me meshuge."

A number of rabbis have consulted me about the problems of their congregants who were alcoholic, whose problems became so manifest that denial was no longer feasible. They have become interested in some of these problems, and have said to me, "I am shocked at how ignorant I was about these conditions."

I recall very well that when I received my smichah, I was quite well-versed in Halachah, and could render reasonable decisions on problems of ritual. However, nowhere in my education was I exposed to the various problems that I have enumerated. Ironically, even in psychiatric training these were not taught, and unfortunately some psychotherapists who are otherwise quite competent fall into the same trap of not recognizing these conditions, and treating their patients for those diagnoses with which they are familiar but which may be incorrect.

While I do not wish to be an alarmist, let me point out that while making an error in most questions of Halachah is a serious matter, it pales before errors in dinei nefashos (laws relating to people's lives). Lives that are lost and families that are decimated by addictive conditions or abusive behaviour fall into the category of "defects that are irreversible." As rabbis, we should make every effort to see that when we beat our heart for "Yoatznu ra," that it not be a true confession.

Rabbi Twerski is a psychiatrist and the founder of the Gateway Rehabilitation Center in Pittsburgh, a leading centre for addiction treatment. An author and associate professor of psychiatry at the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine, he recently launched a new 12-step program for self-esteem development – www.12steps2selfesteem.com.

Day of learning honours mom's birthday

What do you give your mother when she turns 77? She probably has enough scarves and sweaters.

Jacob Salamon decided on a unique and memorable gift for his mother, a Holocaust survivor. He decided to sponsor a day of learning in her honour, which would pay tribute to her past and celebrate her role for the future.

It will also honour other women "for their dedication to our families and our people," according to a media release.

Together with Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, and Chana Weisberg, dean of the JRCC's Institute of Torah Study, Salamon arranged for a program to be held at the Jewish Russian Community Centre, 13 Rockford Rd., Oct. 13, from 2 to 5 p.m. It will include a lecture, workshops and dessert. Weisberg will be the keynote speaker, discussing Finding Faith in Turbulent Times – a tribute to women's strength now and throughout the ages.

The program will also launch the institute's fall semester. Men and women are welcome, but reservations are necessary. For more information, or to reserve, call 416-222-7105, ext. 30.

As a college student, Rabbi Matthew Kaufman underwent a Jewish "awakening process" that led him to study in Israel on a program called Project Otzma.

But it wasn't until he spent a year teaching English in Thailand as a Peace Corps volunteer that he realized he wanted not only to become a rabbi but to attend a Reconstructionist rabbinical seminary.

"In my village [Surin], which was entirely Buddhist, Buddhism was wrapped up in a very natural way in the fabric of everyday life. There wasn't a division between the work and the temple…

"For me this was an important realization that in my own life I wanted to find a place where I could integrate in a natural and seamless way the secular life with the religious life and I wanted to find a community setting that embraced that idea that [Reconstructionism founder Rabbi Mordecai] Kaplan talked about creating.

"Reconstructionism best expressed my desire to have that, coupled with my understanding of a need for a progressive Judaism that retains its hold on tradition."

Rabbi Matthew Kaufman

Today Rabbi Kaufman, 34, is working with the community of 250 families at the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, where he was hired recently as spiritual leader.

Among his immediate goals is to start the congregation, which is unaffiliated but traditional Conservative in practice, on a path to becoming egalitarian.

"It will take time," said Sarah Senior, president of the congregation, adding that the decision to move in that direction was taken only recently, following a general meeting in May.

Currently, Rabbi Kaufman said, women are allowed to read the haftorah and maftir aliyah, but as a rule only bat mitzvah girls do that.

The first step in making the change, said the rabbi, is education about the issues associated with egalitarianism. His wife Sara, a Toronto native and PhD student at the University of Toronto, has already done the maftir and haftorah reading at the synagogue.

Rabbi Kaufman is hopeful the move will appeal to young families who live in the synagogue area, near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue.

The Lodzer was founded by Holocaust survivors, who still form the majority of the membership, along with their children and grandchildren, and other young families.

A recent sukkah-decorating event and a special Sukkot celebration typify the type of "fun programming initiatives" that the rabbi hopes will build the congregation's sense of community, appealing to younger families and rejuvenating older members.

The rabbi's focus, he clarified, is on understanding the issues facing the Lodzer specifically – such as continuity and the role of women – and moving forward from there. His background in Reconstructionism is not an issue, he feels.

"I'm not a fan of institutional Judaism that divides," he said. "I think there are positive aspects to having the different movements. I want to see them all flourish, but I don't like to see [any] divisiveness."

Since his ordination in 1998, much of his professional association has been with the Conservative movement, first as spiritual leader at a small congregation in Turnersville, N.J., and more recently as director of Camp Ramah in Canada for 2000-2001.

Coincidentally, the Conservative congregation in which he grew up in East Lansing, Mich., eventually became affiliated with the Reconstructionist movement.

Jews did not displace Palestinians, says author

Arab enmity towards Israel called root of conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The claim that Jews displaced Palestinian Arabs from their land has no basis in truth, a controversial writer told an audience at Beth Sholom Synagogue recently.

Joan Peters, an American journalist and historian, called that assertion "a flight from fact."

In a 1984 book, From Time Immemorial, Peters suggested that numerous Palestinian refugees were actually non-Palestinian Muslims who had immigrated to Palestine to take advantage of economic opportunities created by Jews.

Challenging a pivotal assumption of the Arab-Israeli dispute, Peters said that what lies at the core of the conflict is not Palestinian rights but Arab enmity and rejection of a Jewish state in the region.

Peters also rebutted Arab claims that Jews had been treated well under Islamic rule, pointing out that Arab anti-Semitism is based on Islamic doctrine.

Some critics have praised her book, which has almost 200 pages of footnotes and appendices, as long overdue.

But others have questioned Peters' sources and methods, saying she underrepresented the number of Palestinian refugees in 1948.

As a result, From Time Immemorial, which took seven years to produce, became a subject of intense controversy, defended or attacked along ideological lines.

In her speech, Peters described From Time Immemorial as a "mystery story I uncovered."

She said left-wing critics have tried, without success, to smear its contents.

Introduced in glowing terms by right-wing Toronto newspaper columnist George Jonas, Peters said Arab attempts to convince the world that Israel is built on confiscated Palestinian land "turns history on its head."

Stating that the Palestinian refugee problem is not at the root of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Peters said the real issue is Arab unwillingness to accept a Jewish state, or, as she phrased it, "an unacceptable dhimmi state." (The term dhimmi denotes a Jew or Christian living under Muslim rule, where dhimmis are accorded protected, but second-class, status.)

Peters said she began investigating the Palestinian refugees, whom she once likened to downtrodden African Americans, because she basically empathized with their plight.

But as she delved into the archives, she said, she could no longer square her assumptions with the facts.

Joan Peters

She learned, for example, that the United Nations' definition of a Palestinian refugee was a person who had lived in Palestine for only two years before the proclamation of Israeli statehood in 1948.

She also discovered that the flight of upwards of 800,000 Jews from their homes in the Arab world was largely ignored.

Speaking softly but defiantly, Peters took Arabs to task for stealing the history of Jews in Palestine.

Belittling the notion that Palestinian Arabs form a distinct group, Peters, much like the late Golda Meir, dismissed the idea of a unique Palestinian identity.

Peters strongly criticized Britain, which had been entrusted with a League of Nations mandate in Palestine, for trying to keep Jews out while "importing" Arabs from all over the Middle East.

Britain's policy, she declared, was "perfidious and criminal."

What troubles her today, she said, is that many Jews have embraced the Arab version of events and that U.S. university campuses have become a forum for Arab propaganda and Israel bashing.

Peters criticized Jews who fight for other people's freedom and dignity but not their own. "What's wrong with standing up for the Jewish people? Why is that considered distasteful?"

Criticizing Jewish students who lack the knowledge to refute Arab claims, she urged them to inform themselves of the facts.

In a reference to Jewish parents, she said, "Teach your kids their history so they can stand up to Arab lies."

The Palestinian problem, she claimed, exists only in the minds of Arabs, who use the Palestinians as a weapon against Israel.

In a commentary on Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza, Peters said, "To say Israel occupied the… West Bank is to deny the history of the conflict."

Peters said that Israel's existence is the only "insurance policy" against another Holocaust.
